In addition, if the Department of Labor is to control the first steps in regard to the prevention of unfair practices, it will have the discretion to cut enforcement off its sources. "Judicial independence" will do the Board no good as to cases that never reach it.

Thus the issue raised is a very narrow one. If the purpose of placing the National Labor Relations Board in the Department of Labor is that the Department and the Board shall function jointly to protect the rights guaranteed by section 7 (a), then the whole enforcement mechanism will collapse because of dispersion of responsibility and because of an overlapping of conciliation and judicial work. And if the Board should operate independently of the Department, it is unfair to make it subject to departmental control over budget and personnel.

In view of these major considerations, which have proved controlling in every other case where the Government has set up a quasi-judicial body, the point that there might be some overlapping of statistical work by the Board and the Department of Labor is trivial and unrealistic. In fact, it is entirely appropriate to amend the bill, as has been done, to provide that the Board should not do any statistical work, mediation, or conciliation, when such services are available in the Department of Labor.

It should be repeated that the National Labor Relations Board is to be purely a quasi-judicial commission. Its prestige and efficacy must be grounded fundamentally in public approval and in equal confidence in its impartiality by labor and industry. If the Board is placed in the Department it will suffer ab initio from the suspicion that it is not a court, but an organ devoted solely to the interests of laboring groups. Far from helping labor, this will impair the work of the Board and render more difficult the sustaining of its supposedly impartial decisions by the Federal court.

Finally, let me emphasize the paramount consideration that the inclusion of the Board in the Department of Labor will injure not only the Board, but the Department itself, and through it the interests of labor. The Department was not established to handle all the industrial relation problems of the Government. It was not established to covet impartial or quasi-judicial functions, or to interpret laws of Congress. It was founded, as is too often forgotten now, as a department for labor, and to "foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment." There is more work of this type to be done than ever before and the Department is in no danger of lapsing into disuse if it is aware of its duties. I believe that labor would have fared better under the codes if the Department had remained true to its function as a militant organ for working people, rather than attempted to appear as a labor relations bureau of the Federal Government, representing all interests alike, and overzealous to guard itself against supposed encroachments. The efforts to secure control over an impartial quasi-judicial board is a definite step by the Department away from those activities which can make it most useful to the working people of America.

The Senate bill very wisely has made the Board an independent agency. The House should follow the Senate on this very vital matter.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman knows, and I think the House should know, that in this amendment all we did was to put the Board under the Department of Labor.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The answer is that while it is claimed that only nominally do we place the Board under the Department of Labor, nevertheless once it is placed there the Department of Labor and the Secretary of Labor are given budgetary control over the Board.

Once you have budgetary control over that Board, the Board must naturally become susceptible to the policies of the Department of Labor.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. The Supreme Court of the United States is under the Attorney General. They cannot hire a janitor without that item appearing in the budget of the Attorney General. Now, no one would say that the Supreme Court is not an independent body.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. We are not dealing with the Supreme Court here. Those gentlemen are appointed for life.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The members of the Supreme Court hold office for life and, of course, are not susceptible to influence.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In a letter to the House Committee on Labor, set forth in the committee's report on the Wagner-Connery bill, Chairman Biddle, of the National Labor Relations Board, set forth the various reasons why the proposed board should be an independent agency rather than in the Department of Labor. These reasons are powerfully reinforced by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Schechter case and in Rathbun against United States.

One of the main points in the Schechter decision was that section 3 of the National Industrial Recovery Act, authorizing the President to promulgate codes of fair competition, constituted an invalid delegation of legislative power in that it permitted the President, without the guidance of adequate standards fixed by Congress, "to exercise an unfettered discretion to make whatever laws he thinks may be needed or advisable for the rehabilitation and expansion of trade or industry." The Court contrasted the delegation of legislative power and the executive procedure provided in the National Industrial Recovery Act with the laying down by Congress of a specific policy to be administered by boards, with procedure of a quasi-judicial nature. Thus the Court referred to the Federal Trade Commission Act, which declared unlawful "unfair methods of competition", a phrase which the Court said "does not admit of precise definition, its scope being left to judicial determination as controversies arise." The following is quoted from the decision in the Schechter case:

> What are "unfair methods of competition" are thus to be determined in particular instances, upon evidence, in the light of particular competitve conditions and of what is found to be a specific and substantial public interest. * * *
> To make this possible, Congress set up a special procedure. A commission, a quasi-judicial body, was created. Provision was made for formal complaint, for notice and hearing, for appropriate findings of fact supported by adequate evidence, and for judicial review to give assurance that the action of the Commission is taken within its statutory authority. * * *
> In providing for codes, the National Industrial Recovery Act dispenses with this administrative procedure and with any administrative procedure of an analogous character.

To enforce the prohibition of the unfair labor practices described in section 8, the Wagner-Connery bill contemplates the creation of a tribunal whose procedure and functions are modeled closely after the Federal Trade Commission. To assure that the proposed National Labor Relations Board will be accorded a similar standing by the courts, it is important that nothing appear in the act indicating that Congress regards the Board merely as a bureau or agency of one of the executive departments.

The nature of boards like the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the proposed National Labor Relations Board is again clearly set forth by the Supreme Court in the case of Rathbun against United States, decided May 27. In that case the Court decided that the President could not remove a Federal Trade Commissioner during his statutory term of office except for the causes enumerated in the statute. The Court distinguished its earlier decision in Myers v. United States (272 U. S. 52), where it was held that the President had the constitutional power to remove a first-class postmaster, despite a provision in the statute that such officer could be removed only on the advice and consent of the Senate. The distinction taken was that the first-class postmaster was engaged in an executive function and hence should necessarily be responsible to the President, whereas the Federal Trade Commissioner was not an executive officer at all, but was acting in a quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative capacity.

The Court referred to the report of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce recommending the passage of the Federal Trade Commission Act:

> The report declares that one advantage which the Commission possessed over the Bureau of Corporations (an executive subdivision in the Department of Commerce which was abolished by the act) lay in the fact of its independence, and that it was essential that the Commission should not be open to the suspicion of partisan direction. The report quotes (p. 22) a statement to the committee by Senator Newlands, who reported the bill, that the tribunal should be of high character and "independent of any department of the Government * * * a board or commission of dignity, permanence, and ability, independent of Executive authority, except in its selection, and independent in character."

Continuing, the Court said:

> Thus, the language of the act, the legislative reports, and the general purposes of the legislation as reflected by the debates, all combine to demonstrate the congressional intent to create a body of experts who shall gain experience by length of service—a body which shall be independent of Executive authority, except in its selection, and free to exercise its judgment without the leave or hindrance of any other official or any department of the Government. To the accomplishment of these purposes it is clear that Congress was of opinion that length and certainty of tenure would vitally contribute. And to hold that, nevertheless, the members of the Commission continue in office at the mere will of the President might be to thwart, in large measure, the very ends which Congress sought to realize by definitely fixing the term of office. * * *
> The actual decision in the Myers case finds support in the theory that such an officer is merely one of the units in the executive department and, hence, inherently subject to the exclusive and illimitable power of removal by the Chief Executive, whose subordinate and aide he is. Putting aside dicta, which may be followed if sufficiently persuasive but which are not controlling, the necessary reach of the decision goes far enough to include all purely executive officers. It goes no farther—much less does it include an officer who occupies no place in the executive department and who exercises no part of the executive power vested by the Constitution in the President.
> The Federal Trade Commission is an administrative body created by Congress to carry into effect legislative policies embodied in the statute in accordance with the legislative standard wherein prescribed, and to perform other specified duties as a legislative or as a judicial aid. Such a body cannot in any proper sense be characterized as an arm or an eye of the executive. Its duties are performed without executive leave and, in the contemplation of the statute, must be free from executive control. In administering the provisions of the statute in respect of "unfair methods of competition"—that is to say, in filling in and administering the details embodied by that general standard—the Commission acts in part quasi-legislatively and in part quasi-judicially * * *
> We think it plain under the Constitution that illimitable power of removal is not possessed by the President in respect of officers of the character of those just named. The authority of Congress, in creating quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial agencies, to require them to act in discharge of their duties independently of executive control cannot well be doubted; and that authority includes, as an appropriate incident, power to fix the period during which they shall continue, and to forbid their removal except for cause in the meantime. For it is quite evident that one who holds his office only during the pleasure of another cannot be depended upon to maintain an attitude of independence against the latter's will.

It is to be noted that though the House Committee on Labor voted to establish a National Labor Relations Board "in the Department of Labor", the committee report states:

> The committee does not intend by this change to subject the Board to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Labor in respect of its decisions, policies, budget, or personnel. An amendment offered by the Secretary of Labor requiring that the Board's appointments of employees shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary was not accepted by the committee. We recognize the necessity of establishing a board with independence and dignity, in order that men of high caliber may be persuaded to serve upon it, and in order to give it a national prestige adequate to the important functions conferred upon it. While it is convenient to locate the Board in the Department which deals with labor problems, this nominal connection will not impair the independence of the Board, which will be free to administer the statute without accountability except to Congress and the courts.

This being the purpose of the committee, is it not the part of prudence to put the matter beyond doubt and establish the Board as a wholly independent agency? The phrase in the bill "in the Department of Labor" standing alone might carry an implication that the Board is a bureau of the Department of Labor and hence automatically subject to the control of the Secretary in the matter of budget and personnel, and invites the risk that under the Myers case the President might have the unrestrained power of removal of the members of the Board during their statutory terms of office, contrary to the intent of Congress.

Therefore the committee amendment should be defeated and the Board should be left independent.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to disagree with my good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], Chairman of the Labor Committee, because I know that in this entire House there is no greater friend of labor and no better fighter for their interest than is the gentleman from Massachusetts. I do think, however, at this point where we are considering the creation of a labor mediation board we ought to be guided by experience.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] says this Board ought to be under the Department of Labor. If that is true, then the Railroad Labor Board, created years ago, should be under the Department of Labor, and it is not. That is an independent Board, and the actions of that Board have been commendable, so that we know an impartial board can do the best job for labor, industry, and the public alike. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] would not tell you that we ought to put the Labor Relations Board under the Department of Labor. If he will not tell you that, then he has contradicted by his silence the very reasoning which he has given you for putting this Board under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor. This is designed to be a judicial, impartial mediation board, and we should not subject it to the influence, control, or domination of any executive department of the Cabinet.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. I know the gentleman from Wisconsin would not say that the United States Supreme Court is subject to the orders of the Attorney General?

Mr. O'MALLEY. That has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. CONNERY. Under the amendment that has been offered we do not give the Secretary of Labor the power to appoint employees.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman answer this question: Does he think the Railroad Labor Board, after 10 years of success as an impartial body, should be put under the Department of Labor?

Mr. CONNERY. Well, in view of the fact they have done very well, I would leave it as it is. If we were creating a new board, that might be a different proposition.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Every board that was created during the last session of Congress, including the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the T. V. A., the Federal Farm Mortgage, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and others, were created as independent branches of the executive departments.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Absolutely. If the public is to have confidence in the impartiality of this Board, it should not be under the Department of Labor because then its decisions will always be clouded in the public mind with the fact the Labor Department is prolabor and the Board is tinged with a handicap in getting wide public acceptance for its findings. Therefore, this should be an independent board.

Mr. CONNERY. It has not been in the Department of Labor up to date and it did not seem to make any difference to the employers.

Mr. O'MALLEY. It will make some difference. Now, I do not say the Department of Labor should not be prolabor. Its business is to foster, protect, and promote the interests of labor, which it should do. But this Mediation Board is supposed to treat all parties affected by its authority fairly, impartially, and without prejudice one way or the other. Those of us who are friends of labor know that labor asks nothing more from government or society than a square deal and wants to give industry and the public a square deal in return. An independent Mediation Board, like the Railway Labor Board guarantees the best method for an all around square deal in labor disputes. I hope the committee amendment is defeated. We should establish an independent Labor Mediation Board.

If this committee proposal to make the Labor Mediation Board a stepchild of the Department of Labor prevails, I shall be forced to offer an amendment to provide that each of the 3 members of the proposed board be appointed by the President, 1 to represent labor, 1 industry, and 1 the public, as on the Rail Labor Board, to insure fairness to all concerned in labor disputes. This I do not want to do, because I believe the President, in his wisdom, will so constitute the new board, if it is an independent agency, when he makes his appointments. Make this Board a real mediation board, not only for labor but for industry and the general public, by voting to defeat this committee amendment, and you will be doing the best job for labor and the country that we could do here today.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. A vote of "aye" is a vote in favor of the committee amendment, which places this Board in the Department of Labor, and a vote of "no" is for the establishment of an independent board?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. A vote of "aye" is a vote in favor of the committee amendment.

The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 48, noes 130.

So the committee amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 8, line 12, after the word "Board" insert "any member of the Board may be removed by the President, upon notice and hearing, for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but for no other cause."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: On page 7, line 24, after the word "created", strike out "as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EKWALL: On page 8, line 4, after the word "members", insert "no more than two of whom shall be members of the same political party."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. EKWALL) there were—ayes 79, noes 97.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) Each member of the Board shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, shall be eligible for reappointment, and shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. The Board shall appoint, without regard for the provisions of the civil-service laws but subject to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, an executive secretary, and such attorneys, examiners, and regional directors, and shall appoint such other employees with regard to existing laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States, as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress. The Board may establish or utilize such regional, local, or other agencies, and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services, as may from time to time be needed. Attorneys appointed under this section may, at the direction of the Board, appear for and represent the Board in any case in court. Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statistical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor.

(b) Upon the appointment of the three original members of the Board and the designation of its chairman, the old Board shall cease to exist; and all pending investigations and proceedings of the old Board, and all proceedings in the courts pursuant to Public Resolution No. 44, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1183), to which the old Board is a party, shall be continued by the Board in its discretion. All orders made by the old Board pursuant to said Public Resolution No. 44 shall continue in effect unless modified, superseded, or revoked by the Board after due notice and hearing. All employees of the old Board shall be transferred to and become employees of the Board with salaries under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, without acquiring by such transfer a permanent or civil-service status. All records, papers, and property of the old Board shall become records, papers, and property of the Board, and all unexpended funds and appropriations for the use and maintenance of the old Board shall become funds and appropriations available to be expended by the Board in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred on it by this act.

(c) All of the expenses of the Board, including all necessary traveling and subsistence expenses outside the District of Columbia incurred by the members or employees of the Board under its orders, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the Board or by any individual it designates for that purpose.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 10, beginning in line 1, after the word "exist", strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and down to and including the word "hearing" in line 9.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

With the following further committee amendment:

Page 10, line 12, after the word "amended", strike out the remainder of line 12 and down to and including the word "status" in line 13.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EKWALL: Page 9, line 6, after the word "appoint", strike out the words "without regard for the provisions of the civil-service laws but subject" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "subject to the provisions of the civil-service laws and."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Do I understand that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] was to dispense with the reading of the bill and print it in the RECORD as amended by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. That request was objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICH: Page 11, line 20, after the word "protection", insert "free from coercion and intimidation from any source."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

(2) To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it: Provided, That subject to rules and regulations made and published by the Board pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay.

(3) By discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this act, or in the National Industrial Recovery Act (U. S. C., title 15, secs. 701–712), as amended from time to time, or in any code or agreement approved or prescribed thereunder, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in this act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein, if such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a), in the appropriate collective bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made.

(4) To discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this act.

(5) To refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 9 (a).

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 12, line 11, after the word "organization", strike out the colon and all down to and including the word "made" in line 22.

Mr. TABER. This provision, Mr. Chairman, provides that 51 percent of the employees of any organization can get together and make an agreement for the discharge of the other 49 percent. I do not believe the Congress wants to go on record in favor of that sort of domination of business. It is absolutely against the interests of the employees of this country, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I merely rise to say this in opposition: The closed-shop proposition in this bill does not refer to any State which has any law forbidding the closed shop. It does not interfere with that in any way.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have sent to the desk is an identical amendment with one that has been voted down.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 25, insert at the end of line 25, the following: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for any person (a) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in section 7; (b) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in their rights to work or join, or not to join, any labor organization."

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use the 5 minutes accorded me, but I would like to call the attention of the House to this amendment. I offer it for two reasons. First, in many important industries there are Communists and Socialists whose sole purpose is to stir up trouble between employers and employees. The amendment will help the employers to protect their employees.

This amendment will not harm the laborers, and it will not harm the employers. On the contrary, it will benefit the employer and the employee. It would prevent any Communist or Socialist from coming into your community or mine and stirring up trouble by antagonizing employees against employers in a given industry. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment, and I hope that Members will vote for it.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this is only another form of the Tydings amendment, and will cut the hide off of this bill. I hope that it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, lines 2 and 3, after the word "organization", strike out "or contribute financial or other support to it."

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I would be derelict in my duty to the great body of the people in my district if I did not do something to protect the integrity of the great lumber organization known as the Loyal Legion Association of Lumbermen.

That organization was formed in 1917 at a time when no organization had even attempted to organize the lumber industry. That organization brought better working conditions for the men engaged in the lumber industry. The very structure and fabric of the 4-L organization is based on cooperation between the employer and the employee. For over 17 years that organization has had harmony in the lumber industry, and there has not been a strike for 17 years in that industry in the Northwest. I am interested only in permitting every man engaged in the lumber industry to join a union of his own choosing, but if this language, which is not necessary for the purposes of the act or for the purposes of carrying the act into effect, remains in the bill, you will have outlawed the only organization that has brought peace and better conditions to the workmen in the lumber industry in the Northwest.

Mr. KELLER. Is this to protect a company union?

Mr. LLOYD. It is not a company union. This is a union formed by the United States Government during the war, to bring peace in the lumber industry at a time when the I. W. W. had dominated the lumber industry.

Mr. KELLER. And the lumber companies have charge of it now?

Mr. LLOYD. No; it is a cooperative organization, dominated by the men themselves, with a United States district judge as the final arbiter.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Who contributes to it financially?

Mr. LLOYD. Both the company and the men.

Mr. GRISWOLD. They contribute jointly?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. SCHULTE. A report has been circulated throughout the Northwest, and in the gentleman's district also, that the lumberjacks today out there are the poorest paid of any in the United States.

Mr. LLOYD. They are poorly paid, but their conditions are far better than they were before the 4-L organization came into being.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by Mr. LLOYD.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Lloyd amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPRESENTATIVES AND ELECTIONS

SEC. 9. (a) Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment: Provided, That any individual employee or a group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer.

(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit.

(c) Whenever a question affecting commerce arises concerning the representation of employees, the Board may investigate such controversy and certify to the parties in writing the name or names of the representatives that have been designated or selected. In any such investigation, the Board shall provide for an appropriate hearing upon due notice, either in conjunction with a proceeding under section 10 or otherwise, and may take a secret ballot of employees, or utilize any other suitable method to ascertain such representatives.

(d) Whenever an order of the Board made pursuant to section 10 (c) is based in whole or in part upon facts certified following an investigation pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, and there is a petition for the enforcement or review of such order, such certification and the record of such investigation shall be included in the transcript of the entire record required to be filed under subsections 10 (e) or 10 (f), and thereupon the decree of the court enforcing, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Board shall be made and entered upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 13, after line 13, strike out all of subsection (b) including lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to insure to employees the full benefit of their right to self-organization and to collective bargaining, and otherwise to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Substitute offered by Mr. TABER: Page 13, line 14, strike out lines 14 to 17, inclusive.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the result of this substitute amendment would be to do away with the power of the Board to decide what the unit of representation of employees should be. Under the bill, the way it is presented here by the committee and with the committee amendment as it stands, the Board could create units or districts or territory over which a single operation or decision or bargaining could take place, which would include plants where the employees did not belong to the union at all and were perfectly satisfied with their situation, and would throw them right out of employment. I do not think we ought to pass the bill with any such provision in it. I hope the committee will adopt this amendment and prevent such an outrage happening.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 43, noes 78.

So the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 4, after the word "hearing", insert "upon due notice."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: Page 13, line 23, after the word "unit", strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no unit shall include the employees of more than one employer."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, the whole purpose of this bill, the whole theory of it is that you are giving the employees of this country the right to make their own free decision as to what union they shall belong to, or whether they shall belong to any union at all. Under the committee amendment just adopted, if I construe it correctly, the employees of a given plant might be included in a unit designated by the Board, including several other plants, and forced into an agreement or under an agreement in which they had not participated, made by a union to which they did not belong and to which they did not want to belong.

I favor the right of labor to organize, and I am supporting this bill. I am speaking as a friend of labor and as a friend of the bill. As one gentleman said today, you cannot have a one-sided bill and have a fair bill. I think this amendment is a fair amendment. I think it is in the interest of organized labor and that they should not force, if any such intention exists in the committee amendment, the employees of any given plant into a union that they do not want to belong to. This amendment simply provides that there shall be no unit set up by the Board to include the employees of more than one employer. If the same employer has five or six different plants, they can put them all into one unit, but they cannot take the employees of one isolated plant and include them in a craft unit or any other sort of unit which the Board may set up without their consent and against their wishes.

I hope the Committee will adopt the amendment, because I think it will help the bill to be a success. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have to disagree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]. I know he is honest in his belief that this amendment will improve the bill, but if the amendment is adopted it will be impossible for the national board to designate a larger unit than those employed by one employer. The coal operators and mine workers of this Nation are now engaged in working out an agreement that will affect some five or six hundred thousand coal miners of the United States. If this amendment is adopted it will preclude the power and authority of the National Labor Relations Board to have anything to do with designating a larger unit than one employer's unit, and they are represented by a number of employers.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. According to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, the United Mine Workers would have to deal with each separate one, and they could not unite for collective bargaining as a unit in the coal industry.

Mr. WOOD. That is very true. That is also true with the building-trades industry. They reach their agreement in the cities between the general contractors' association and the various organizations. When that agreement is signed, of course, it covers any and all contractors who come under the agreement that are union.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The amendment I offered does not prevent other unions joining in and making a collective agreement. The unit which the Board designates is for the purpose of selecting representatives for collective bargaining. After they are selected they can get together and make an agreement covering the whole industry, but the purpose of this committee amendment is to provide a unit in which the representatives of the employees are to be selected, and for that purpose only. It would not prevent an agreement in the mine workers because they are already organized and have already selected their representatives.

Mr. WOOD. But if the gentleman's amendment is adopted the employees can only select their representatives from that one unit. The employees could not designate a national officer to represent them.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; they could. By action of their union they could do that.

Mr. WOOD. They could not represent more than one unit.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Oh, yes. This limits the Board in setting up a unit for the purpose of selecting representatives. That is all.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSPECK) there were ayes 129 and noes 75.

Mr. CONNERY. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CONNERY and Mr. RAMSPECK to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 127 and noes 87.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to change my vote from "no" to "aye," and for the purpose of making a motion to reconsider the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that such a motion is not in order in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PREVENTION OF UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

SEC. 10. (a) The Board is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in sec. 8) affecting commerce. This power shall be exclusive, and shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, code, law, or otherwise.

(b) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, the Board, or any agent or agency designated by the Board for such purposes, shall have power to issue and cause to be served upon such person a complaint stating the charges in that respect, and containing a notice of hearing before the Board or a member thereof, or before a designated agent or agency, at a place therein fixed, not less than 5 days after the serving of said complaint. Any such complaint may be amended by the member, agent, or agency conducting the hearing or the Board in its discretion at any time prior to the issuance of an order based thereon. The person so complained of shall have the right to file an answer to the original or amended complaint and to appear in person or otherwise and give testimony at the place and time fixed in the complaint. In the discretion of the member, agent, or agency conducting the hearing or the Board, any other person may be allowed to appear in the said proceeding to present testimony. In any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

(c) The testimony taken by such member, agent or agency, or the Board shall be reduced to writing and filed with the Board. Thereafter, in its discretion, the Board upon notice may take further testimony or hear argument. If upon all the testimony taken the Board shall be of the opinion that any person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on such person an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, and to take such affirmative action, including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of this act. Such order may further require such person to make reports from time to time showing the extent to which it has complied with the order. If upon all the testimony taken the Board shall be of the opinion that no person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue an order dismissing the said complaint.

(d) Until a transcript of the record in a case shall have been filed in a court, as hereinafter provided, the Board may at any time, upon reasonable notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any finding or order made or issued by it.

(e) If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States (including the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia), or if all the circuit courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United States (including the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia), within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the unfair labor practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for the enforcement of such order and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, and shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including the pleadings and testimony upon which such order was entered and the findings and order of the Board. Upon such filing, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and shall make and enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript a decree enforcing, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Board. No objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent or agency, shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, and to be made a part of the transcript. The Board may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of additional evidence so taken and filed, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, and shall file its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order. The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate circuit court of appeals if application was made to the district court as hereinabove provided, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347).

(f) Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in any circuit court of appeals of the United States in the circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court a written petition praying that the order of the Board be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Board, and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, certified by the Board, including the pleading and testimony upon which the order complained of was entered and the findings and order of the Board. Upon such filing, the court shall proceed in the same manner as in the case of an application by the Board under subsection (e), and shall have the same exclusive jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and shall in like manner to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, the order of the Board; and the findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall in like manner be conclusive.

(g) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (e) or (f) of this section shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Board's order.

(h) When granting appropriate temporary relief or a restraining order, or making and entering a decree enforcing, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part an order of the Board, as provided in this section, the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity shall not be limited by the act entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes" (U. S. C., title 29, secs. 101–115).

(i) Petitions filed under this act shall be heard expeditiously, and if possible within 10 days after they have been docketed.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 15, line 20, strike out the word "appear" and insert the word "intervene."

In line 21, after the word "proceeding", insert the word "and."

Page 16, line 24, strike out "If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may," and insert "The Board shall have power to."

Page 17, line 21, after the word "modifying", insert "and enforcing as so modified."

Page 19, line 20, strike out all of lines 20 and 21 and insert "and in like manner to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order."

Page 20, line 14, strike out "(U. S. C.," and insert "approved March 23, 1932 (U. S. C., Supp. VII."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HALLECK: Page 15, line 23, after the word "shall", strike out the word "not."

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, I want briefly to call attention to what this amendment would do. If the bill becomes law a national labor relations board is set up which, as I understand it, will be a quasi-judicial body charged with hearing and determining certain questions of fact which may be presented to it. It is provided in subsection (b) of section 10:

(b) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, the Board, or any agent or agency designated by the Board for such purposes, shall have power to issue and cause to be served upon such person a complaint stating the charges in that respect.

It is further provided that the board shall thereupon hear witnesses and take testimony with a view of determining whether or not there have been unfair labor practices.

The particular provision to which I object reads as follows:

In any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

I propose to strike out of that sentence the word "not" and to provide thereby that the general rules of evidence applying in courts of law and equity shall prevail. My idea is simply this, that the board is charged with the duty of determining questions of fact. In my view these facts should be established as any fact is established in any court, by competent evidence. I do not mean evidence circumscribed by technical rules, but I do mean that it should be evidence of fact as distinguished from hearsay, rumors, or reports; that the persons who are there present and testifying shall testify to such facts as shall establish the charge.

Further in this connection, a considerable point is made in the report of the committee to the effect that when an appeal is taken or the order is taken to the United States Court it is not tried de novo but is tried upon a transcript of the proceedings and the testimony and the evidence before the board.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment merely to state that it has been clearly set out during many years why it was necessary to do away with the ordinary rules of evidence when it came to administrative boards of the United States Government. In hearings before these boards one is not dealing with a jury. Evidence presented before these boards, therefore, should not be circumscribed with all the technical rules of admissibility which have been found necessary in presenting evidence to juries.

I call the attention of Members to the fact that in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Workmen's Compensation Board the usual rules of the admissibility of evidence do not apply.

I hope the amendment is defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HALLECK) there were—ayes, 84, noes 117.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 15, line 2, after the word "code", strike out the word "law."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he will not accept this amendment. It seems as though, were he really anxious to improve the bill, he would accept this amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. I will say to my friend that ordinarily I would be glad to accept an amendment of this sort, but the word "code" can mean something else besides an N. R. A. code.

Mr. TABER. I am just trying to strike out the word "law."

Mr. CONNERY. No; I think we better leave the language of the section as it is written. We have had a number of constitutional lawyers studying this bill for weeks, and I think it is a pretty good bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, that indicates the attitude of the committee with reference to this bill. They want it just as bad as it can be. If a law is passed, of course, changing any rule with reference to this bill, that law would supersede this. The fact this word is in there indicates they are trying to do something that is impossible. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INVESTIGATORY POWERS

SEC. 11. For the purpose of all hearings and investigations, which, in the opinion of the Board, are necessary and proper for the exercise of the powers vested in it by section 9 and section 10—

(1) The Board, or its duly authorized agents or agencies, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any evidence of any person being investigated or proceeded against that relates to any matter under investigation or in question. Any member of the Board shall have power to issue subpenas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of any evidence that relates to any matter under investigation or in question, before the Board, its member, agent, or agency conducting the hearing or investigation. Any member of the Board, or any agent or agency designated by the Board for such purposes, may administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such evidence may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory or possession thereof, at any designated place of hearing.

(2) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person, any District Court of the United States or the United States courts of any Territory or possession, or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry is carried on or within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides or transacts business, upon application by the Board shall have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, there to produce evidence if so ordered, or there to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

(3) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, records, correspondence, documents, or other evidence in obedience to the subpena of the Board, on the ground that the testimony or evidence required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

(4) Complaints, orders, and other process and papers of the Board, its member, agent, or agency, may be served either personally or by registered mail or by telegraph or by leaving a copy thereof at the principal office or place of business of the person required to be served. The verified return by the individual so serving the same setting forth the manner of such service shall be proof of the same, and the return post-office receipt or telegraph receipt therefor when registered and mailed or telegraphed as aforesaid shall be proof of service of the same. Witnesses summoned before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

(5) All process of any court to which application may be made under this Act may be served in the judicial district wherein the defendant or other person required to be served resides or may be found.

(6) The several departments and agencies of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the Board, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any matter before the Board.

SEC. 12. Any person who shall willfully resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any member of the Board or any of its agents or agencies in the performance of duties pursuant to this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

LIMITATIONS

SEC. 13. Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

SEC. 14. Wherever the application of the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 707 (a)), as amended from time to time, or of section 77 (b), paragraphs (l) and (m) of the act approved June 7, 1934, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto" (48 Stat. 922, pars. (l) and (m)), as amended from time to time, or of Public Resolution No. 44, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1183), conflicts with the application of the provisions of this act, this act shall prevail: Provided, That in any situation where the provisions of this act cannot be validly enforced, the provisions of such other acts shall remain in full force and effect.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 24, line 7, insert the words "Supp. VII", and on page 24, line 8, strike out "(b)" and insert "B."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BIERMANN: On page 24, strike out section 13 and substitute the following language: "Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to diminish the right to strike before an agreement has been made between the employer and the duly authorized representatives of the employees. After that agreement has been made, and so long as it shall be observed by the employer, a strike shall be considered as a violation of the spirit of this act."

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to read the section as it is now and the amendment which I offer in its place. The section as it reads now is:

Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

I offer as a substitute these words:

Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to diminish the right to strike before an agreement has been made between the employer and the duly authorized representatives of the employees. After that agreement has been made, and so long as it shall be observed by the employer, a strike shall be considered as a violation of the spirit of this act.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is another amendment like the Tydings amendment that would hamstring this bill. It would take the heart right out of it and kill the bill. It is another way of interfering with labor's right to strike, which is not a right that comes from Congress, but is a divine right which comes from the Almighty God.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BIERMANN) there were—ayes 115, noes 109.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CONNERY and Mr. BIERMANN to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 107 and noes 140.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 24, at the end of line 20, insert a new section, as follows: "Nothing in this act shall abridge the freedom of speech or the press as guaranteed in the first amendment of the Constitution."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. If any provision of this act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 16. This act may be cited as the "National Labor Relations Act."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be given permission to renumber the sections.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ARNOLD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, under the resolution (H. Res. 263), he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments agreed to in committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HARTLEY moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Labor with instructions to that committee to refer the bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: On page 11, line 20, after the word "protection", insert the following: "free from coercion or intimidation from any source."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Twenty Members have risen. Not a sufficient number.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "An act to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—WAGNER-CONNERY LABOR-DISPUTES BILL

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this session of Congress I have favored the passage of an adequate bill guaranteeing the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively, and wiping out the inequalities in bargaining power between the employer and employee. I believe that the Wagner-Connery labor-disputes bill, which has been favorably reported by the House Labor Committee, upon which I have had the privilege of serving, will do much to accomplish these purposes and to prevent industrial unrest. I am heartily in favor of its passage now by the House and am opposed to amendments which will hamstring its enforcement.

This bill strengthens the guaranties to labor of the right to organize and bargain collectively, as originally provided in the National Industrial Recovery Act. By this legislation we state clearly that—

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

The bill further defines these rights by prohibiting the following unfair labor practices on the part of the employers:

First. Restraint or coercion of employees in the exercise of their rights to organize and bargain under the section quoted above.

Second. Domination or interferences with the formation or administration or contribution of financial or other support to labor organizations.

Third. Discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in labor organization. "A reservation is made of the right of the employers and employees to make voluntary contracts to operate under a union-shop agreement."

Fourth. Discharge or other discrimination against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this law.

Fifth. Refusal to bargain collectively with the representatives of the employees, who are selected by a majority vote, in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment. Employees other than the designated representatives, individually or otherwise, may present grievances.

The principal objection to the bill has been to this section defining unfair trade practices. The chief misrepresentations relative to these provisions alleged that they compel closed-shop conditions.

A careful analysis of this bill will show, however, that there is no requirement by governmental regulation that shops be unionized, but merely a guarantee of the right of the workers, however organized, to determine by a majority vote who shall represent them in negotiations on rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions. The closed shop may be established only in those cases where the employer and employee voluntarily operate on this basis.

The bill provides further for creation of a National Labor Relations Board, a quasi-judicial group with three members, which is given authority to investigate industrial disputes, discrimination, and other violations of the law. If, after proper notice and hearings, the Board finds that any concern has been engaging in any of the unfair labor practices listed, it has authority to issue orders prohibiting such violation of the law and may take affirmative action to enforce its orders. It may order reinstatement of employees unfairly treated in violation of the law, with or without back pay.

Penalties are provided for failure to observe the law, and provision is made for enforcement through the courts. Many of the legal technicalities are waived in connection with the procedure of the Board, and representatives of the Board are authorized to hear disputes in various parts of the country, so it is unnecessary for a worker to journey to Washington to present his case.

As indicated in the preamble of the bill, this legislation is necessary to equalize the rights and privileges of workingmen and their employers by removing the inequalities in bargaining power. It also aims to give the worker full freedom of association with a view and for the purpose of securing an agreement on any matter in dispute in the relationships of the employer and the employee.

Since the great expansion of our industrial system, the laborer has become only a small cog in the vast industrial machinery, and an attempt is made here to preserve his right to stand on an equal footing with the employer in making a contract for the sale of his services and regulating the conditions under which he works. I urge the enactment of this bill by the House.

While those of us who favor the bill are very hopeful that it will accomplish all the purposes intended, its success will depend upon the character of the members of the Board appointed by the President and the thoroughness and firmness with which they administer the act.

Mr. GILDEA. Mr. Speaker, eternal vigilance is the price American workingmen must pay for economic freedom. The strong right hand of labor must always be on the alert to stave off the armed forces of aggrandizement, and unfortunately, labor must be equally as vigilant to safeguard its interest from the mistakes of those who pose as well-meaning friends.

The Wagner-Connery labor-disputes bill was hailed as a new Magna Carta for organized labor. It was looked upon as a measure restoring lost teeth to section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act, but the teeth have been for the time being pulled out and the intention of the labor-disputes bill has been as completely turned aside by amendments as section 7 (a) was nullified by the Richberg interpretation, and if the amendments tacked onto the bill are permitted to remain therein the bill itself will be as powerless as N. R. A. after the Supreme Court decision had replaced the Blue Eagle with a stuffed chicken.

The same forces are at work today and within the circle of labor's friends originate the harmful amendment, just the same as the interpretation on section 7 (a) in the Motor Code case was made by a recognized friend of labor.

The amendments tacked onto the labor-disputes bill were no bright little ideas that came spontaneously to their authors as they sat in their seats on the floor of the House.

The major amendment would prevent the new National Labor Relations Board from recognizing as a collective-bargaining unit any group consisting of employees of more than one employer.

Coal miners in my home district would be compelled to deal with each individual employing company and the principle of collective bargaining, established through 35 years of untiring effort, would be wiped out by congressional action in a bill supposedly drawn up in the interest of the working class.

The amendment strikes a damaging blow against national unions which labor through its own effort has created and degenerates into an extension of the Government-union idea, one union for each plant.

The open shop would be restored, chaos in industries such as mining would ensue, and protection would be given the chiseler instead of support and protection being given the organized workers of each separate craft.

Business, as well as labor, is better off when wage conditions are uniform in an industry.

The Senate and the House conferees must strip the amendments from the Wagner-Connery bill.

Labor must insist on a roll-call vote as its one and only safeguard against under-cover effort on the part of the opposition to defeat its program.

Real friends of labor, such as Senator WAGNER and the Chairman of our own House Labor Committee, BILL CONNERY, can be counted upon to strike out the damaging amendments in conference and then it behooves all of us to stand up and be counted in defense of the conference report and in support of the principle of collective bargaining recognized and established as a national policy through the Labor Relations Board.

Labor looks for the support and backing of every Roosevelt Democrat on this side of the aisle. Labor appreciated the aid given this bill by true-hearted liberals on the other side of the aisle, who were among the staunchest supporters of the bill.

The combined strength of both forces is needed to smoke out the opponents, and there is just one way to make this bill a power for good—strip the bill of its nullifying amendments and give the newly created Labor Board a complete set of sound teeth with which to enforce regulations, and then through Government recognition of the rights of labor weld the man power of the Nation into a united force working for the general welfare of our people and the permanent recovery of our Nation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the revision of my remarks a letter I wrote to employers on the Wagner-Connery labor bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

EQUALITY OF RIGHTS AND OPPORTUNITIES AMONG WAGE EARNERS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement issued by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, today the feeling against trade unionism has narrowed down to the issue against the closed shop. That term, if not positively unfair, is unfortunate. It is an appeal to sentiment, not to right reason. The closed shop is the union shop, or contract shop, for it is founded on a contract between the employer and the union authorized to speak for his employees.

Freed from all complications, what is the closed-shop issue? It has two sides, one legal the other economic and practical. A well-organized union offers to supply all the labor that an employer needs in a certain line. It proposes a contract covering wages, hours, and so forth. It is based on the principle of collective bargaining and, as a necessary corollary, collective responsibility. The union guarantees efficient and good work on the part of the employees. It cannot assume responsibility for outsiders, having no control over them.

It asserts that a shop cannot be half union and half nonunion and, therefore, it asks the employer who is willing to recognize the union at all, and with it the principle of collective bargaining, to agree to employ none but union labor. The union shop, in other words, is to be closed to nonunion workmen, not only in the interest of the contracting employees, but also in the interest of the employer.

It is clear that in America industrial peace must be based upon reason rather than force. We have always cherished the ideal of employers and workers working together with friendly and open minds in order that they may exchange views and arrive at solutions grounded not in compulsion but in mutual concessions and mutual benefits. This may be termed the method of conference, of give and take, of free cooperation.

The railway industry is the best example of the conference or voluntary method of ironing out industrial disputes between employers and employees. In this industry, the Government long ago sponsored the device of "secret elections of representatives" for collective bargaining in which the principle of majority rule applied.

In practice it was discovered that majority rule was best for employers as well as employees. Workers found it impossible to approach their employer in a friendly spirit if they remained divided among themselves. Employers likewise found it more satisfactory to confer voluntarily with a united and contented group of workers than with a group torn by internal dissension. Singleness of purpose and responsibility on each side gave to business transactions that stability which every employer desires.

Another necessary condition of peace was that the representatives of the workers should gain their confidence by representing them alone, just as an advocate in court speaks only for one side. Hence the railroad industry completely outlawed the sham union which was financed and controlled by the employer.

The right of every man to sell his labor as he sees fit is exactly the right on which the closed shop is based. The right to work and to contract for work includes the right to refuse to work except under certain conditions, and the nonemployment of certain classes of labor may very well be one of these conditions.

The right of the nonunion man is not infringed upon when the unionist merely refuses to work beside him or when he asks the employer to choose between them. As to the employer, he has a right to hire anyone he pleases, and he may discriminate at will against union and nonunion labor. Indeed, he lays great stress upon this right; and should he desire to make a contract with a union, what is to prevent such preference?

The reasons that appeal to a union man for not working with a nonunion man are manifest and obvious. Men instinctively love the society of their kind, whether in work or play, and the man who desires the society of his companions must arrange his life so that his associates are content to live with him.

Trade unionists have for centuries believed that they were upholding the rights of men, protecting the welfare of their class, and promoting the interests of their homes; that without the union shop, their liberty and their independence would be gone. This is not a fact of trade unionism alone, but a deep abiding fact in human life. In the last analysis, it is the law of self-defense; and employers have exactly the same feeling toward one of their members who gives his influence to the other side. Both feel that the offending man is disloyal to his class, and just so long as industry is carried on by two classes in hostile camps, this feeling must and will continue.

A nation goes to war to protect one of its subjects; so the union makes it its duty and concern to preserve the rights of its humblest member. This can be done only by masses of men and women who are willing to stand or fall together.

Already this responsibility for man to man has been laid upon workmen by the law. Though the employer insists that he alone has the absolute right to employ or discharge at will, yet the courts have always insisted that it is the workman who is responsible for the negligence and lack of skill of his fellow workman, and it is he who must assume this burden or give up his employment.

The land is full of cripples, widows, and orphans whose injuries are caused by the negligence of some fellow servant whom the employer forced upon the workman; and these cripples, widows, and orphans are turned out without redress, without protection, upon the legal theory that each workman is responsible for his fellows.

The battle for trades unions has been long and bitter, and most of their rules and conditions are really founded on necessity, and are right and just in the light of experience. A close study would show that few rules established by the unions are severe or arbitrary. They have arisen in the heat of conflicting interests, and from the necessity of dealing with watchful and unscrupulous enemies.

The history of trades unionism is the history of the progress of the common people toward the comparative independence which they enjoy today; it is one long tale of struggles, defeats, and victories, and every step in their progress has been fought against stubborn and powerful oposition.

The closed shop in the only sure protection for trade agreements and for the defense of the individual. The open shop destroys organization, and in reality is the open door through which the union man goes out and the nonunion man takes his place. The open shop means uncertainties, anxiety, and a shifting basis for the principles of industry. Under the open shop, the easy job goes to the nonunion man, to the friend of the employer; the hard and dangerous task to the man whose devotion to his fellows incurs the enmity of the boss.

I am convinced that the old dog-eat-dog competition between business and business and between employer and employee is the way of destruction. That system has produced many depressions in the past, and progressively worse and longer depressions. If human experience is any guide, that old system, if allowed to continue, will produce even worse havoc in the future. It will destroy itself, as it almost destroyed itself last time.

War and strife are not ideal states, but so long as the struggles of classes continue, the weak and helpless must look to trades unionism as their most powerful defender.

This bill is intended to give to labor the effective use of its right to organization. The provisions of this bill are intended to restate labor's bill of rights and to make them effective as applied under modern conditions of industry. It is not designed to meet the present national emergency only. It is intended for all time.

Because of the vital importance to national recovery of equality of rights and of opportunities among wage earners as well as employers and other citizens, I trust you will support this measure, for if it fails of passage it will be evident that labor was misled by Congress when section 7 (a) was originally enacted and that labor's right to trade-union organization does not and is not intended to compare with the employer's right to collective action through organization.

Mr. Speaker, I tender a statement of the junior Senator from New York, the Honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER, published in the Washington Daily News this afternoon. It discusses the important features of the bill now before us for consideration, and is very informative.

The majority of criticisms against the national labor relations bill spring from misinformation about its provisions and purposes.

First, there is the charge that the measure would regiment men in national unions. On the contrary, the bill gives added protection to workers who wish to exercise their free choice to remain completely unorganized. It provides specifically that no worker can be discharged or paid lower wages or discriminated against in any way because he refused to join any labor union of any kind.

DOES NOT FORCE UNIONISM

Second, there is nothing in the bill which favors the closed shop. It provides merely that closed-shop agreements may be made, but only in those States where they are now legal, by voluntary agreements between employers and employees. In fact, the bill somewhat narrows the now existing law sanctioning such agreements by stipulating that they shall be valid only when desired by the employer and the majority of the workers to be covered by them.

Finally, it has been argued that the bill, in order to be fair, should protect employees from "coercion" not only by employers, but by other employees as well. This argument neglects the simple objectives of the bill.

All the bill intends is to provide that employers shall not interfere with the self-organization of workers. Certainly employers already possess the right of self-organization without interference by employees; thus the bill aims at equality, not inequality.

SUPERVISION NOT SOUGHT

To supervise the activities of employees among themselves would be as foreign to the purposes of the legislation as to supervise the activities of employers among themselves. The bill does neither.

To saddle upon the National Labor Relations Board the duty to prevent "coercion" by labor unions or employees would create a superfluous remedy for wrongs simply dealt with today by police courts and by injunctive relief in Federal and State courts, and in addition it would destroy the usefulness of the Board by overwhelming it with petty complaints.

Moreover, in view of court decisions, the prohibition of "coercion" by employees would give new congressional sanction to those many old decisions which have banned peaceful picketing, the mere threat to strike, and even the circularization of banners, on the ground that they were "coercive." This in effect would repeal the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act, and instead of promoting the freedom of the worker would drive him back into the bondage that existed before that humane piece of legislation was enacted.

OLD-AGE SUPPORT AND THE PROBLEM OF SWOLLEN FORTUNES

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the support of old age and great fortunes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, there was a time in this country when the common laboring man could provide a living for his family while saving sufficient for old age. And there was a time when it was possible for laboring men to help their aged parents while providing for their own family. But under new and changed conditions this time is past and gone; and the work-worn laboring man is left at the close of life's weary day helpless, dependent, and without means to live.

In the days of his young manhood and prime he had expended his strength and energies, he had exhausted his body, he had sped up in production, he had produced to the limit of endurance. But he had toiled and labored only to find the ownership and credit for the wealth he had created had passed from him to others. And he had only taken from his toil and labor sufficient to sustain him from day to day and that only while he remained employed.

Even the common middle classes, always holding and using some property of their own with their labor for income, and saving up a sufficient sum for use during their declining years, now find themselves bankrupt and insolvent, without means and support in their old age. Finally, the earnings of the middle classes have been reduced until the amount received is barely sufficient for their needs from day to day. And following came the panic or depression to sweep away the savings of former years, leaving them destitute and in want in the winter of their lives.

Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, shows in a statement of earnings and income that out of 120,000,000 people 96,000,000 are making incomes barely sufficient to meet the present needs to live, leaving nothing to serve for old age, and millions becoming dependent each year.

Even up to this time, every two men who are earning their living are paying taxes in some form for the present support of another man, with earnings and income still diminishing and taxes and the cost of living still increasing. This great economic, industrial change, this failure of earnings and income of the many, the masses, the multitude, has come to be the pressing problem, pressing for immediate action and solution. And to meet and solve the problem and to remedy the cause we must know why this change came, we must know how it came, we must know the men or forces bringing it on, we must know the system under which it came.

All wealth is dug out of the ground or created by toil and labor. But the many who produce the most of it have come to possess and enjoy the least of it, and the few who produce the least of it have come to hold the most of it. The few have come to hold wealth which they could not dig out of the ground nor create by their toil and labor, working every day for a thousand years and for which they have never worked for a single day to produce or acquire.

It has been stated and shown by authority that less than fifteen one-hundredths part of the people have come to own and possess eighty-five one-hundredths of all the wealth and property of the country. And that less than fifteen one-hundredths part of the wealth is left to be divided up among more than eighty-five one-hundredths of the people. There has been a certain amount of wealth created and is in existence in this country, and where a few men hold such great wealth and part of the property and earnings it follows as a conclusive result that only a small part is left, and very little can be left for each, when divided up among the many.

But if the national debt does not exceed or equal all wealth today, and these powers of money or wealth to double and multiply itself shall be allowed to continue on, it is only a question of time when a few men will own all the wealth and the many will own little or nothing. But the rich are growing richer, and the poor are growing poorer. The few are taking more and more of the incomes, and the many are taking less and less of the incomes. Last year 26 more men took a million dollars or more each and 81 less men were taking $5,000 each, and still more were left with little or no income.

But there is much evidence and authority to show that, in fact, all wealth has already passed from the many—the masses—to the certain special few. While a part has been left remaining and shown held in the name of the people, the people have given their notes and mortgages and are charged on bonds and obligations until the public and private debt now stands in excess of all wealth. Mr. J. H. Rand, of the Remington Typewriter Co., is authority for the statement in 1932 that the total debt was $141,924,300,000, while the total value of all wealth was $138,000,000,000—or total wealth two billions less than the total debt, and on the application of all the property to the debt there would still be a deficit and no equity remaining.

And what is true today of the distribution of wealth is true or more than true of the earnings and income of industry. Less than fifteen one-hundredths part of the people are taking over eight-five one-hundredths part of the earnings and the income, or seven times as much income as eighty-five one-hundredths of the people are taking to be divided up among them. The incomes and earnings of all the people working and producing together is variously estimated and stated from 60 to 70 billions of dollars annually under normal industrial conditions. This is a huge, monstrous sum of money—too large for realization or comprehension, too large for any few men, but not so large if divided out among the 120,000,000 people accordingly as they labor to produce.

During the last few years of normal conditions, from this national income, some men have reached in and taken out $5,000,000 each. Some men have taken four, three, or two millions each, one family has taken over $55,000,000 a year; 16,000, or less than thirteen one-hundredths part of the people, have taken four and one-half billions annually, leaving the remaining part to be divided up among the balance of 120,000,000 people. Then another certain few men, taking only less than $1,000,000 each, have taken a large part of what remains, leaving a still smaller portion to be divided up among the remainder of 120,000,000 people.

This condition is all because of the system under which money makes money, and makes more money and faster than men by labor can make money. And the money of the few men makes more money than the labor of the many. Wealth and capital increases and multiplies, and the capital and wealth of a few men increases and multiplies and brings more income than all the toil and labor of the many, the multitudes.

Under new and changed conditions, with the automatic machine in industry which has taken the place of manpower, and is supplanting the craft of the human hand, the certain special few are taking both the earnings of capital investments and the greater part of the income which in other times was going to labor. And certain few gambling financiers are acquiring billions from the people under and by stock-jugglery operations and holding-company manipulations, and the system of reorganizing corporations with watered- and excess-stock issues.

These few men are making money not only by collecting interest on their own money, but by collecting interest on all the people's money, by collecting interest on every dollar which the Government puts into circulation, and collecting this interest as long as it remains in circulation. But, even more than collecting interest on their own and people's money, by certain gambling devices and fictions, they are loaning 10 times their capital and deposits, and are collecting interest on billions of dollars loaned which, in fact, have no existence.

Labor and the consuming masses must pay the final and total interest charge on all the interest collected in whatever form, and from whatever source. They must pay the interest charge upon the corporation debt of 76 billions. They must pay the interest charge upon the urban mortgage debt of 37 billions. They must pay the interest charge upon the bank loans of 35 billions. They must pay the interest charge upon the State, county, and municipal debts which now amount to more than 25 billions of dollars. They must pay the interest charge upon the increased national debt, now amounting to 32 billions of dollars.

They must pay the interest charge upon the farm mortgages of $9,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon life-insurance loans of $3,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon the retail installment loans, now amounting to more than $3,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon the unlawful pawnbrokers' loans, which now amounts to over $1,000,000,000. They must pay the interest charge upon the total staggering debt, which now amounts to more than the value of all wealth, and which it is absolutely impossible for men to pay.

These are some of the ways a few are making more money than the many—the masses, the multitude—are making by their own toil and labor, working long hours day in and day out, working through all the years of a lifetime.

But even more pressing than the problem of the cause, than the problem of the remedy, is the problem of the relief. And first the relief of the aged and those who have labored without recompense and who have toiled a lifetime in vain. It is a problem which must be met, met promptly and without delay. We cannot wait to change our industrial system. We cannot wait to remedy the evils of our monetary or currency system to provide for relief of toilers in old age. Their working days are over. They cannot go back to begin again. The earnings and income from their labor have passed into vested property rights of great wealth and swollen fortunes and are claimed and held by the certain special few.

The pressing emergency can only be met promptly as required by taxation. The problem is what property shall be taxed to reach relief and make up from the earnings and income taken from the producers in their working days for their support in their old age.

The common middle classes have always borne and are now bearing the great burden of all taxes and they are now assessed to the limit. They can pay no more taxes.

Taxes are of two kinds—direct and indirect taxes. Direct taxes are paid at the courthouse, and which the people know how much they are paying, how much of their wages, income, and money is being taken from them. Indirect taxes are mixed and mingled with the price and levied upon the necessaries of life, which the people must pay to live and in such a way they cannot tell how much is price and how much is tax. They only know the high cost of living, they only realize the labor required to live. The people are paying these indirect taxes every time they make a deed or conveyance of real estate, every time they make a check to pay a bill or debt, every time they buy a cigar or tobacco, every time they buy a bottle of perfume or toilet article, every time they buy a ticket to a show or amusement, and every time they purchase an article upon which a tax is in some way levied.

Every article of necessity or convenience is burdened with indirect taxes in some form—hidden, covered, and concealed in the price—and the people are paying these indirect taxes not only once or twice a year but continuously and constantly every day and every week and every month of the year. The common middle classes are now paying direct taxes at the courthouse. They are paying indirect taxes. They are paying income taxes. They are paying sales taxes. They are paying gross-sales taxes. They are paying process taxes, and they are paying taxes in many other indirect forms.

Under these present-day tax conditions the common middle classes of the people, to meet the tax demands upon them, are being drained of their incomes. They are being exhausted of their earnings. They are surrendering up the whole of the surplus of the fruits of their toil and labor. And after exhausting their present income and earnings, they are giving up their savings of former years to pay and satisfy the tax demands upon them. They are borrowing money to pay taxes. They are mortgaging their property to pay taxes. They are selling their property at sacrifice sales to meet and pay the taxes assessed upon them.

With these amounts the people are sacrificed to pay, the taxes are not sufficient to meet the demands. New forms of taxes are being devised. New sources of taxes are being planned to reach further tax resources, to take and exact even more taxes, even still greater taxes, from the people.

A sales tax is not a tax levied upon the principle of ability to pay; it is a tax levied upon the necessities of life, and it cannot be borne by the middle classes while burdened by the payment of other taxes. Another and additional tax levied now upon the middle classes of the people, another property direct or indirect tax, another sales transaction or income tax, would be the straw to break the camel's back and would be killing the goose that laid the golden egg.

The tax charge upon the people has grown until today it is $14,000,000,000, or an average per capita tax of over $114. The debt charge upon the people has been computed at present from one hundred and forty-one to two hundred and three billions of dollars. The average interest per capita charge is $115. The total tax and interest charge is over $36,000,000,000. The average per capita tax and interest charge is over $200. This amount every man, woman, and child must pay before they can provide themselves with the necessaries and comforts of life. Out of every $1 of earnings and income, 20 cents is taken as direct or indirect taxes, 33 cents is taken as interest, leaving less than half for use in fact, to provide the necessaries and comforts of life, and leaving every man to labor and toil 113 days to pay interest and taxes, out of each year.

The poor are unable and cannot pay taxes. The common middle classes are now taxed beyond the limits of their ability to pay and can pay no more taxes. And wealth is often held concealed in the form of intangible property and even if reached is shifted back upon the people in the price of necessaries.

Sometimes the common people, staggering under the burdens of taxation, demand a tax law requiring equal payment from money, capital, and wealth and enact a demand into another property direct or indirect tax, another sales-trans-law. Then, if the statute runs the galling gantlet of shrewd and crafty constitutional lawyers and the tax is assessed and levied upon wealth as required by law, the certain special few men, upon whom the tax was levied—in control of industrial production and the means to fix and control the price and the supply and distribution of the necessaries—with the power of a king, and the flourish of a despot, shift the tax back upon the people levied and assessed upon the necessaries of life and collect the whole from the helpless individual man and continue to make the people pay their taxes.

The problem is how to make wealth help pay taxes. Great wealth and swollen fortunes have not been paying taxes, according to the principle of ability to pay. The United States Senate committee in investigating taxes in 1933, found that the great bankers and financiers had not been paying their income taxes. This committee found that they had paid no taxes in 1930, that they had paid no taxes in 1931, that they had paid no taxes in 1932, and they had evaded all income taxes for 3 years.

To better show this, I quote from the late Calvin Coolidge, former President of the United States, in speaking upon another phase of taxation, but incidentally appearing as follows:

> Taxing the rich to help the poor, the poor are not helped but hurt. Taxes have to be collected by the rich before they are paid.
> They are collected from all the people. A higher tax means real wages or lower, the cost of living is higher, a chance to work is less, every home is burdened, its value is decreased, the quality of the food and clothing and shelter of the children is reduced.

This statement of the great ex-President is true, and strongly and explicitly stated. But instead of exempting the rich, because the rich shift the tax back upon the people, some way must be found and devised to tax the rich as well as the poor by exerting greater control over industry to protect the poor from the imposition of indirect taxes and to make the rich pay their own taxes.

But there is a way to tax great fortunes, by a tax upon high excess incomes, whether declared or left in the form of corporation stock and regardless of being juggled through holding companies. By enforcing the antitrust laws and dissolving combinations in restraint of trade to prevent shifting taxes back upon the people levied and assessed upon the necessaries of life, taxes can be collected upon incomes growing from great fortunes.

The poor cannot pay these taxes. The common middle classes are now already over tax-burdened. They are now taxed to the limit. They can pay no more taxes, whether as a direct or indirect tax or a covered, concealed, sales, or transfer tax, until men can recover back and take their just and equitable share of the earnings and income from industry, until they can claim and take income as buying and consuming power to provide for the present and to save up for the future.

A tax should be provided for the support of those who are dependent in old age and are beyond their working and earning days and still without other means of support, of from $30 to $50 per month, accordingly as their needs require to live in comfort and without want.

If this is not a conservative policy today it will be conservative tomorrow. It will be an orderly exercise of the taxing power to prevent a disorderly revolution. It will accomplish in a peaceful way what delay will bring in a violent way.

Former President Theodore Roosevelt, during his official term of office, foreseeing the conditions of today, in a public address said:

> I feel that we shall ultimately have to consider the adoption of some such scheme as that of a progressive tax on all fortunes beyond a certain amount, either given in life or devised or bequeathed upon death to any individual; a tax so framed as to put out of the power of the owner of one of these enormous fortunes to hand down more than a certain amount to any one individual.

The time has come, it is here as foretold by Theodore Roosevelt, when we shall ultimately have to consider the adoption of a progressive tax. This has come as an emergency to provide for the old-age workers.

This is not only humanity and justice, but it is a necessary policy to safeguard the security of wealth, to assure the peace and order of society, to preserve our free competitive system of industry, and to hold our institutions and form of government safe from overthrow, revolt, and revolution. The owners of wealth and great fortunes should recognize the seriousness of the problem resulting from the inequitable distribution of wealth and income and share their income with labor, and should willingly pay for the support as well as to provide for the aged and infirm. It is only by providing such means of support and by sharing such income that the owners can be secured in reasonable wealth, while maintaining peace and the security of society, and the existing order of civil life.

WAGNER-CONNERY LABOR-DISPUTES BILL

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Wagner-Connery bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, when section 7 (a) was written into the National Recovery Act for collective bargaining, the manufacturers immediately got busy to discredit all of the standard unions and independent unions and attempted to organize their own company unions, which, of course, would be dominated by themselves.

They had spent large sums of money and have placed in charge of organizing all such company unions in the hands of their own selected men, which of course is contrary to the law. The manufacturers were permitted to draw up their own codes and yet they were not satisfied with such arrangement but made a great effort to break down the morale by giving out misstatements to the press, and especially when the labor attempted to have an investigation made of the automotive industry. A report was drawn up known as the Henderson-Lubin report and which report I personally thought would be a whitewash for the manufacturers, but on the contrary, to my surprise the report was in favor of the employees for the whole automotive industry.

Immediately thereafter, the mouthpiece of the automotive industry, Mr. William S. Knudsen, of the General Motors Corporation, made a statement in behalf of all the automobile makers citing figures from the automotive record and attempted to disprove the Henderson-Lubin report which attacked the practices of the industry. He followed with a statement, stating "that the men who made the report had no previous experience in the industry and some who did the major work had never been in an automobile plant."

When testimony was being taken before the Labor Committee, to the effect that men over 40 years of age were being discarded as fast as possible, Mr. Knudsen stated that their company employed more than 90,000 men over 40 years of age and that their seniority rights were protected.

I happen to know personally, having lived in Detroit the greater part of my life, which is the center of the automotive industry, that men over 40 years of age are being discharged and younger men employed in their place for the reason that the younger man can get more work out and can keep up more easily with the established speed-up system. However, this same young man who has taken the place of the man 40 years of age, when he attains the age of 40, he is worn out, old, and positively no seniority rights are allowed him.

Recently when an election was held in the city of Detroit in the automotive industry, where the employees had the right to designate who would represent them, the employer saw to it that the men voted for company unions, dominated by the manufacturers, or the men did not vote at all, and when the election was over the manufacturers released to the press a statement that "the American Federation of Labor had no hold on the employees of the automotive industry." However, they did not state the true facts and that they had employed many new men in the industry and did not hire any men who either were members of an independent union or the American Federation of Labor. To prove that this practice was absolutely true, during the time of the election, when notices were posted in the plant of the Dodge Bros. at Detroit, that representatives were to be elected to represent the workers and that a mass meeting was to be held on the following Sunday, the notices were torn down and a bulletin substituted in its place, which reads as follows:

To all employees:

Attention is directed to the fact that it is a direct violation of the company's rules for employees to pass out hand bills, papers or cards of any sort for political or other purposes, or to make solicitations in the plants.

It is also against the rules of the company to post notices on bulletin boards without first securing the consent and approval of the management's special representative.

(Signed) DODGE BROTHERS CORPORATION,
Division of Chrysler Corporation.

The records will show which disprove the statement made by Mr. Knudsen, that in 1904, 1,291 man-hours were required to build an automobile. That in 1919, 313 man-hours were required; in 1929, 92 man-hours were required to build an automobile. But the most striking feature of the automobile industry is, that when it worked under the N. R. A. they cut the hours to 40 hours to build an automobile; in other words, they speeded up the machinery to such an extent that they actually made slaves out of the workers, and naturally a man was unable to stand the strain and was discharged immediately and replaced with a younger man.

The reason I am citing the automobile industry is that I am well acquainted with the situation; however, this applies to all industry that employs man power. This same procedure has been carried out in the oil industry; while working under the code, which called for 40 hours per week, they paid men for 40 hours but made them work as high as 72 hours and forced the employees to sign weekly slips to the effect that they only worked 40 hours.

Since the decision of the Supreme Court, which I personally think has been only arbitrary, all of the good which had been accomplished for the actual worker and employee under section 7 (a) has not only been wrecked by the decision, but the chain stores immediately cut wages of their employees and extended the hours. In chain drug stores, where the minimum wage was $25 per week, men were immediately cut to $15 per week and their hours lengthened and one or two employees were discharged.

This is the same in chain grocery stores, where a minimum wage of $15 per week was paid. In each individual case where a store belonged to a chain store then hours were extended and the wages cut as low as $8 per week and several clerks were released on account of extension of hours for the employees that were retained in that particular store.

To strengthen the hands of the administration, the Wagner-Connery bill, when it becomes a law, will force the manufacturers and employers to abide by the law for the benefit of all employees. Time has come that the large interests and special privileged interests must be disseminated and the control of the country placed in the hands of the people, and small business must again be revived; however, all of this can only be accomplished by legislation and the passage of the Wagner-Connery bill, which, I believe, is the first step toward giving the employee the right he has fought for for the past hundred years.

There is no doubt that the greedy manufacturers will attempt at all times to break down the morale of this law, but the teeth they have put into this bill will force them to keep their hands off the employee and let him belong to any organization he wants to and will not allow the employer to coerce the employee into voting to keep their own racket going, as the bill has been written in such a way that the majority of the employees will have the right to belong to such labor organizations as they see best, and the minority groups will have to abide by the decision of the majority.

THE IMPORTATION OF NATIONAL DEFENSE IN THE AIR

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech of Gen. William Mitchell on a unified air force.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I say that I have recently been in conference with General Mitchell, and I have the greatest respect for his ability. I hope to see his speech printed in full in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include á copy of the address of Gen. William Mitchell before the Massachusetts Camp of the Fifth Division, May 25, 1935, Boston, Mass, as follows:

Mr. President and Massachusetts Camp of the Society of the Fifth Division: When people who have not participated in war begin to talk about anything being a greater trial of men's souls than war, they just don't know what they are talking about. It is only from veterans such as you that a nation can draw any conclusions as to what the elements of our national defense must contain in order to have a successful nation. Without an adequate national defense, we can have no state. The fully armed man is the only one who can hold his head high and look his peers eye to eye. So it is with a nation.

There is no difference in the aims and national policies of the great countries of Europe from what they have been in the past. Russia is striving more than ever for empire and for an ice-free port in the Mediterranean, through the Dardanelles, and on the Pacific, combined with the consolidation of her dominions east of the Pripet swamps. The English are trying to hold their line of military depots around the earth, into which the raw materals of the nations may be gathered, shipped to England in British ships, manufactured, and then distributed to the world through their far-flung fortified marine bases. It is the old Phoenician system revamped. The French, the true descendants of the Roman Empire, whose population is rapidly decreasing, wish to hold their marvelous country and as a reserve to draw on their African empire for maintenance, both in men and materials. They arm to the teeth and want to be let alone. The Germans, a virile people, intelligent, strong, brave, and ambitious, wish to possess themselves of the rich lands, resources, ports, and commerce of the nations that surround them. They believe that their culture, their genius and enterprise is superior to anybody's. Italy, inhabiting a country devoid of major resources, with unfertile soil except in places, and with an overpopulation, is attempting strenuously under an able chief to maintain its position among the great nations.

As far as we are concerned, in the United States, the European problems, while being extremely interesting to us, should not be allowed to lead us to any act of participation, as far as we can avoid it. The policy enunciated by the Father of our Country, General Washington, to abstain from any entangling alliances, is as sound today as it ever was.

It is not with Europe that our greatest future concern lies. It is with the Far East. We may consider that white civilization passed through several periods. There was the Mediterranean period, from which the Romans emerged victorious, followed by the Atlantic period, which the last war probably ended. The United States emerged from it as the most powerful country. Now, we are entering on a Pacific period. Straight across on the other side of this great ocean is the empire of Japan, reaching out for world dominion. Any idea that the Japanese are not doing so is absolutely without foundation. They are not only organizing to dominate the whole of Asia, but to extend this domination to the whole world. The only thing that will deter them is armed force. Whenever the Japanese see a decadent military power near them, they pounce on it if they have anything to gain. The Japanese consider us a decadent military power. They consider that on account of the riches we possess, the easy existence we have led and the false theories that have grown up among us as to national defense, that in a little while we will be as easy to attack as a large jellyfish. But our people say, "How can they get at us? All this Japanese scare is foolishness. They can't do anything. They are 7,000 miles away." This was so in the old days of sea power, which have now passed. These are the days of air power. The air is now the decisive element.

As I flew over the army lines in Europe and looked at them, I thought to myself as I saw the men being hurled time after time into that charnel house how very ineffective the ground system of war is. The object of war has been in the past to defeat the hostile main army so as to get at the centers of population and resources of the opposing state and to destroy their will to fight. But armies cannot do this against modern weapons, and in attempting it they wreck themselves almost as much as their enemy. At the time of the armistice nobody knew who had won the European war. There was not a hostile foot on German soil. Their country and territory was intact, and the Allies did not dare carry the war into Germany.

Our conclusion from observing all these things was that the decisive element in war is the direct attack of the population and resources of a hostile state. This can be done only through the air. Armies can be stopped by other armies. Navies, acting in an indecisive theater, the water, can be easily destroyed by air power. Of course, we must have armies in order to hold the ground. We must have submarines and a properly organized navy; but the decisive element of the future unquestionably is the air bomber which goes straight to the opposing vital center and makes it untenable for the people. It takes very little effort to do this. We hear all this silly talk from Army and Navy officers of the enormous number of tons of projectiles needed to destroy a city. That has nothing to do with it. What the air force will do is to so intimidate the population that they will leave their cities. I have seen cities and towns evacuated as the result of raids of only two or three bombers and stay evacuated during the rest of the war. Cities such as New York or Boston would be evacuated instantly in case a few tons of explosives, incendiary bombs, and gas were dropped on them. The effect of gas on cities is unbelievable. Water systems, power centers, and means of communication can be neutralized in a similar manner, particularly by heavy concentrations of gas. This is no idle thought; it can be easily demonstrated by actual test.

Since the war the great nations have organized not only into armies and navies but they have air forces entirely separate and distinct. This air force is not designed to protect either the army or navy, but to protect the country by attacking the hostile nation in its heart. Each great nation in the world except the United States now has on hand aircraft that can go to the vital centers of their most dangerous enemy. Japan has planes in existence that can go to Alaska, and that probably have a sufficient radius of action to go from Alaska to New York and back. These things cannot be proved definitely, because we cannot see their ships; but with engines that are in existence today we can make airplanes that can go from 6,000 to 8,000 miles, carrying from 2 to 4 tons of explosives, and we can get a ceiling around 35,000 feet. We know it is perfectly impossible to stop an air attack.

The development now is not to have a few small aircraft maneuvering around over a navy, such as our Naval Air Service, or a few short-distance airplanes, such as our Army has, maneuvering in infantry formations over them, but a force of long-distance aerial cruisers that go not only hundreds but thousands of miles. The amount of money, number of men, and quantity of resources necessary for an organization of this kind is trivial compared to the enormous expenditures and effort we have to put into a navy. And when you have built up a navy, what is it going to do? It is only chained to its bases and can only act in the water, and can be easily destroyed.

I believe that the future security of this country depends primarily on an efficient air force. I have come to this conclusion, not by hasty opinions formed on the spur of the moment, but after years of study, experience, and trial, both in war and peace. One would think that in a country such as ours, with its vaunted initiative, progressive ability, and pioneering spirit, that long ago we would have had the best air force in the world, but, unfortunately, we have the worst. During the European war the construction of our aircraft fell into the hands of profiteers. No attention was paid to the recommendations of those of us on the front as to what was necessary. Over $1,500,000,000 was spent and no aircraft suitable for war were sent to us on the front. For about 5 years after the war these profiteers were run to cover and during that time we led the world. We held every record. We flew all over this country, Alaska, and around the world. We demonstrated the power of the air against navies, armies, and civil establishments. We installed the air mail. Remember, this was developed by the Government. We laid out plans for air lines all over the world. We laid out an experimental program which, if followed, would have made us the unquestioned leaders of the world today. But we gained so rapidly that the jealousy and pig-headedness of the older services were aroused and brought into play to stop our development. The profiteers again saw a chance to get control of the appropriations for aviation. The Army did not want aviation because it disturbed the old system. The Navy did not want it because it would destroy all their ships. Neither of them wanted a new thing like the Air Force, as it would be the most popular branch in the country, so they set out to limit it and destroy it as far as possible, and, if they couldn't do that, to control it.

Every time any matter came up which required development and progress and conflicted with the old system, they had boards. Each one was longer, narrower, and woodener than its predecessor. To one who knows, the reading of these reports is nauseating. They form a disgraceful chapter in the development of our military history. This includes the two most recent boards appointed, the Baker and Howell Boards. Neither has recommended anything constructive. None of them had members who really represented air thought. All of them were controlled more or less by the profiteers and the older services, and the result has been that in a world-competitive market for air power we have attempted to suppress competition, while the others have met it and forged ahead.

Two companies monopolize the furnishing of service-aircraft engines to our Army and Navy. These engines are of similar type and are only of 750 to 800 horsepower. Other nations have gas engines up to 3,000 horsepower and Diesels of about half that power. They have personnel instructed in air duties instead of being trained first as ground officers or sea officers, which ruins them. They have well-thought-out air policies which look years ahead and develop methods, personnel, and equipment to meet future needs. We have joint boards of the Army and Navy which are merely debating societies of old gentlemen who either have never been in an airplane or have been flown around by some young pilot and then have had some wings pasted on them, and call themselves observers, who have never seen anything of war in the air.

During the last year we have had the terrible fiasco of the air mail as handled by the Army. This was because the Army has tried to keep its aviation immediately over the infantry where they could see them and prescribe what they should do, what equipment they should have, and how they should handle it.

The airmen were told by their ground superiors, "You can fly around a little in good weather where we can see you, where you will do no harm, and not get out of hand." The gasoline and flying time was cut down below the danger point. Their aircraft are merely little training planes, and even their art of flying was greatly impaired. Our war-time aviators, even with the old equipment, could have gone through with it.

Flying along the airways is simple compared to what we will have to do in future wars. There are aids to navigation everywhere, lights every few miles, radio direction indicators and beams, enormous landing fields, and things of that sort. If a military airman cannot fly under these conditions, what is he going to do when he has to find his way from here to Europe or Asia and back again without any such help? As a matter of fact, navigation, as it is now called, is the most accurate means of finding ones way from place to place that exists today. On the surface of the earth, either on land or sea, the visibility is limited because the atmosphere is loaded with moisture, which causes snow, fog, rain, and storms. With the modern airplane we can rise up into the stratosphere, where absolute clarity of vision is always present, where conditions never change, where we can always get sights on celestial bodies. With sights on two celestial bodies or a couple on the sun 2 hours apart we can locate ourselves with absolute precision, that is, with enough accuracy to bomb a city without seeing it. If we wish to send an aircraft from here to Herat, Afghanistan, all we have to tell the pilot is the latitude and longitude of the place, and he can go straight there and return. This of course does not mean that in war every ship we send out is going exactly there and coming back, but 80 to 90 percent of them will, if they have adequately trained crews and the equipment we can make nowadays.

If there ever was an inexcusable falling down on the part of the Army it was in handling the air mail last year. They had the usual whitewash board on the subject, known as the Baker Board, which distributed false information to the American people and recommended no changes except some for the worse. The so-called "General Headquarters Air Force" puts the Air Service under the Army more than ever. It was tried out by everybody in 1916 and 1917 and abandoned.

Within the same period, we have lost two splendid airships in this country, the Akron and the Macon, due to gross stupidity and lack of knowledge of air matters. The Akron was taken out in the face of a terrific storm, flown straight into the middle of it and destroyed. This ship had had four or five commanders during the 6 months preceding. An airship is one of the most difficult means of transportation to handle that has ever been devised. It requires a personnel of long and consistent training. With such a personnel, it is the greatest means of transportation ever created. Airships can be built now that can go clear around the world at the latitude of the equator on one charge of fuel. They are extremely competent instruments of war. I can recount to you many actual experiences in war as to their value and about their prospective value in the future.

The Macon was then taken out to sea in the Pacific with its structure badly injured and flown on through heavy winds so as to keep it over the boats on the water and, of course, it went to pieces. This was gross stupidity. Airships have to be navigated according to the weather. They have to be kept out of dangerous places. Nobody would think of navigating our old sailing ships into the middle of a hurricane, or even pushing our modern ocean liners full speed ahead into a tropical storm.

What is needed is a permanent personnel to handle our ships. Look at the way the Germans handle theirs. I have visited the Germans frequently in times past, and keep track of them. They don't lose their ships. The reason they don't is because of their knowledge of their possibilities and their limitations.

Here the aircraft profiteers attempt to minimize the value of airships so as to shift appropriations of airplanes and then into their own pockets. What has been done about improving our airship situation? Absolutely nothing. Just a lot of talk about whether they are good for anything or not, on the part of Army and Navy officials, principally the Navy, who don't want airships anyway. All they use them for is as adjuncts to a surface fleet. One airship properly equipped and handled could probably destroy a whole surface fleet, with the airplanes it can carry and release, and with its means of concealment, speed, and radius of action. The airship question has been referred to another board, and, as usual, little or nothing will be done. We are able to build perfectly good airships, equip them, man them and handle them if given a chance, but so far we have killed practically all our airship personnel and have got to train a new force. It has been proved that it cannot be done by the Army or Navy. A good thing for us to do would be to go in with the Germans on a round-the-world air service until our men are sufficiently instructed, then branch out for ourselves. We need commercial airship lines across the Pacific, and a development of military airships. Airships are cheap as compared with sea ships and we should not abandon them.

Within the last year we have had one airplane crash after another on our commercial air lines. These have nearly all been caused by fog, ice, storms, or something of that sort. The recent death of Senator Cutting, where the airplane flew right into the ground, is a good example. There is no reason for these things. Development of our equipment has been hindered by the profiteers because they wish to get the greatest production with the minimum change, consequently any innovation is looked on with disapproval.

Aircraft can now be made, and have been capable of being made for years, which will be as safe as any other means of travel. They should be equipped with engines using noninflammable fuel, such as hydrogenated gas or heavy oil. They should contain the automatic pilot, a gyroscopic instrument which maintains an airplane in level flight no matter what the conditions of weather or visibility may be. They should have means of landing in fogs which have been entirely perfected and by which an airplane can come into an airport and land without anything being visible to the pilot. Thousands of landings have been made under such conditions. They should have resonance altimeters which indicate how far the ground is under them, instead of the ordinary aneroid instrument which tells approximately how much air is over them. They should have landing sticks that project below the ship 30 or 40 feet, so that if the pilot cannot see the ground as it is approached, the stick on touching the earth will set the controls back, cut off the throttle, and land the ship. But above all they should have cabin parachutes, which take the whole cabin out, passengers and all, landing them as safely as the individual parachute does.

The handling of our aeronautics is a sorry page in the history of our national defense. In my opinion it is worse than the Teapot Dome scandals or any of those concerning war contracts of the Civil War. We spent a billion and a half dollars during the war and never sent a suitable airplane to Europe. We have spent an equal sum since and now have no suitable planes, systems, or organization for defending ourselves against a first-class power. The only way we can rectify this condition is by pressure of intelligent public opinion.

The profiteers control to a great extent the kind of information about aircraft given out through the press. Their propaganda extends to the radio stations, and to the stockholders who have been induced to buy stock in these Government-supported factories throughout the country. With an uninstructed and uncritical public they get away with it. Anyone who opposes them is immediately attacked. Evidence before congressional committees shows that there are about 37 financial manipulators who control our aeronautics.

It means utter defeat for us in a future contest unless it is stopped. What we must do with our aeronautics is to create a single department of aviation entirely separate from everything else, with an air force to do the fighting and a commercial aviation which we should push to the ends of the earth. It is not sea power that the nations are now developing. It is not land power. It is air power. There is as great international competition now for gaining world air lines as there was for gaining sea lines in the middle of the last century. We should get these before it is too late. That we have any divine inspired right to anything of this kind is a silly idea. If we do not look out, the other people will have them before we wake up. Merely resting on our valor of ignorance will get us nowhere.

You veterans know what international contests mean, especially against a highly trained and technically proficient people such as the Europeans and certain Asiatics. Excellence has to be attained by actual deeds, not by boodling and camouflage. What we should have, of course, is a single department of national defense, with subdivisions for air, land, and water, all of them working together and for the United States, instead of some special interest such as the Army, Navy, or aircraft manufacturers.

There is considerable hope in the Congress, but I see very little in the executive departments. They are about as moss-backed as any outfit we have ever had. Don't infer from my remarks that I am not a great believer in our country. I know that we have the greatest country in the world, and that our people are superior to any. I am a Democrat, and believe in Democratic principles, but the bureaucracy which is being foisted upon us more and more, which is exemplified in our national defense as much as anything else, the living way beyond our income, the attempt to pull ourselves up by our own bootstraps—all this is an extremely serious condition of affairs. We must face things as they are and organize accordingly.

You of the Fifth Division who attacked across the Meuse River may remember that before your offensive considerable air activity occurred in your part of the sector. I sent one single formation of 322 planes, loaded with 39 tons of bombs, to attack ammunition dumps and troop concentrations in the vicinity of Longuyon. Of the American and Allied ships under my command there were 1,496 at the battle of St. Mihiel and about 1,200 in the Argonne.

When you crossed the Meuse, the fighting on the front of our army in the Argonne had separated almost into three distinct sections; yours on the right, one on the center out from Montfaucon, and another on the left around Apremont and the Argonne Forest. I was always fearful of German counter-attacks between these almost detached forces, consequently kept a vigilant eye away behind their lines with my airplanes, attacking both their air and ground formations whenever practicable. This resulted in terrific air battles in which our men greatly distinguished themselves. We shot down 456 enemy airplanes and 62 balloons. Our losses were 199 airplanes and 22 balloons. The excellence to which our American air service, using French equipment, had come is not generally known but at the time of the armistice we were unquestionably the best organized and instructed air service on the Western front.

The Great War is a thing of the past. Other wars will come and our Republic will undoubtedly have to bear the brunt of the battle for the upholding of our European culture and conditions, both economic and military, against the military, economic, and political systems of the Asiatics. If we wish to exist as a nation we must prepare to meet them. The world is now only one-sixth as large as it was when we went into the Spanish War, one-third as large as it was in the World War, due to the speed of aircraft.

A nation, ambitious, strong and virile, with air power, radio telegraphy, highly organized industry, and chemical development, can today aspire with hope of success to world dominion. Only by maintaining adequate national defense can we Americans hold our heads up in the family of nations and insure peace and prosperity for our people in the future.

JUDGE WILLIAM F. CONNOLLY

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, any effort that could possibly be made by me to pay tribute to the memory of the late Judge William F. Connolly, who passed away at Detroit, in the State of Michigan, on May 23, could not be commensurate with the services which he performed for his fellow man, for the party of his political faith, or for the community in which he was born and where he spent virtually all of his life. Words are inadequate to pay the tribute which his ever useful life deserved.

For a great many years Judge Connolly served as Democratic national committeeman from Michigan, and his services during the war years of 1917 and 1918 were of tremendous value. His great legal mind was of tremendous service to the late President Wilson, who called him to Washington in the early days of the world conflict; and he was frequently called into conference for the purpose of lending his vast knowledge to the solution of problems which the war developed.

Few men developed minds of the character which won for Judge Connolly wide renown in Michigan and in other States of the Union. He was born of Irish parents in that section of Detroit which is affectionately remembered as "Old Corktown." His was a humble beginning, and his attainments were solely the result of his indefatigability. Throughout his school days he struggled for an education; and when it is realized that at the tender age of 16 he was teaching Latin and Greek at the University of Detroit, it is possible to grasp in some small way the enormity of his mental attainments.

Long before he reached the voting age, Judge Connolly was a dominant factor in the councils of the Democratic Party of his State. He was a born organizer, and one of liberal leanings. It was but natural that the party of Jefferson should have attracted him, as he learned his first lessons in politics in a district that is overwhelmingly Republican. The success of the Democratic organization in Michigan a quarter of a century ago, and again in 1932, was largely due to his ability to win friends to the cause he chose to support.

In the legal field, Judge Connolly will long be remembered. He graduated from the University of Detroit with an A. B. degree before he was old enough to enter practice, and was, a few years later, to become the youngest man ever elected to the bench in his State. Decisions rendered by this able jurist have long been recognized for their clear interpretations of the law. His fairness was at all times apparent to those who appeared before him, and his consideration for the underprivileged and the unfortunate is legendary in his home State.

Loyalty was another attribute in this great leader—loyalty to friends and to political associates. There was nothing of the smallness of petty politics in the character of William F. Connolly. He stood for principles throughout his long career, and there was no sacrifice which he was unwilling to make to maintain those principles. Well schooled in the philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of our party, Judge Connolly upon every occasion, whether it be a national convention or a district caucus, fought to keep the Democratic Party faithful to the teachings of its illustrious founder.

The charity of Judge Connolly, in early life and later when he reached the position of affluence and wealth, will long be remembered. In his quiet way he went about doing good, extending the helping hand to those in need, and always ready with a word of encouragement to the depressed. In his church he was a leader, and his contributions to the upbuilding of the diocese of Detroit to its position as one of the greatest dioceses of the country, stand as a monument to unselfish service.

These few remarks of mine do not begin to tell the story of a life devoted to assisting others. It is but a humble effort to express appreciation of the services performed by a truly great man. It is my prayer that they be spread in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that copies may be forwarded to the bereaved family of Judge William F. Connolly.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on the Wagner-Connery bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD under the rule:

House Resolution 266

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8554, a bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1935, and June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization may sit tomorrow during sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am just as anxious to have the Congress come to an early adjournment as anyone, but, on the other hand, unless you have some real important business and a constructive program for the balance of the week, I do not see the reason for all this haste just at present. If the gentleman will explain to us what he proposes to consider for the balance of the week I shall be pleased to listen.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We intend to take up a large deficiency bill tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. With a special rule providing for 2 hours of debate, you can finish that in 4 hours.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not believe we can, but, anyhow, if we can, so much the better. I hope we may adjourn over Saturday.

Mr. SNELL. If we can get a definite agreement that we will adjourn over Saturday I shall not object to meeting at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know what the committees may bring in, I am sure, and I really have no right to hypothecate the rights of the committees, but I am hopeful we many adjourn over Saturday.

Mr. SNELL. What is on the program for Friday?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Unless some major legislation comes in which is not now in sight, we have a number of rules which can be taken up on Friday and also some conference reports.

Mr. SNELL. Meeting at 11 interferes with important committee meetings.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think we can dispose of the deficiency bill tomorrow, even if we meet at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SNELL. The Chairman of the Rules Committee agrees with me, so I must be right.

I object, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MITCHELL of Illinois, for 3 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEAGALL (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), on account of death in family.

To Mr. OLIVER (at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama), on account of illness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 59. An act to create a national memorial military park at and in the vicinity of Kennesaw Mountain in the the State of Georgia, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 2739. An act to extend further time for naturalization to alien veterans of the World War under the act approved May 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 165), to extend the same privileges to certain veterans of countries allied with the United States during the World War, and for other purposes.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JUNE 20, 1935

(Legislative day of Monday, May 13, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Wednesday, June 19, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR CARTER GLASS, OF VIRGINIA

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity of expressing the satisfaction I have felt in the recognition this year by leading American universities of the character and service of my dear friend and colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Honorary degrees have been conferred on Senator GLASS by the College of William and Mary, the National Institute of Social Science, Princeton University, Tufts College, Wesleyan University, and Yale University.

The citation that was made yesterday at Yale was so deserved that I wish to incorporate it in the RECORD at this point. Professor Nettleton, as orator, said:

Recognized officially as the senior Senator from Virginia, recognized throughout the Nation as a dauntless leader of the independent force of intelligent public opinion; a representative of the people, "who never sold the truth to serve the hour", or the party, or the populace. Representative at Washington in nine successive Congresses, Secretary of the Treasury under President Wilson, Senator of the United States, thrice confirmed by popular vote and public demand, he recalls the Roman courage and constancy, and the integrity of the ancient phrase, "Senatus, populusque Romanus." This year the National Institute of Social Science conferred upon him its gold medal "in recognition of distinguished services rendered to humanity as one of the leaders in the planning and creation of the Federal Reserve Banking System * * * and as one who has through a long life consistently and unsparingly devoted his abilities and energies to public service."

'Tis, finally, the man, who, lifted high,
Conspicuous object in a nation's eye—
Who, with a toward or untoward lot,
Prosperous or adverse, to his wish or not—
Plays, in the many games of life, that one
Where what he most doth value must be won,
Whom neither shape of danger can dismay,
Nor thought of tender happiness betray;
Who, not content that former worth stand fast,
Looks forward, persevering to the last,
From well to better, daily self-surpast
Vir amplissimus.

President Angell, in conferring the degree, said:

Statesman and patriot, instant in the defense of your country's welfare and honor, implacable foe of sham, dishonesty, and cowardice in public life, able and fearless leader whose sage counsel has for more than a quarter of a century contributed wisdom to our national policies. Yale University, in grateful recognition of your eminent service to the Nation, confers upon you the degree of doctor of laws and admits you to all its right and privileges.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 1180) to amend section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, and it was signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the United States praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana (Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON), which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. TYDINGS presented resolutions adopted by the annual meeting of the Archdiocesan Union of the Holy Name Society, Baltimore, Md., protesting against the alleged use of the franking privilege by Mexican officials in sending through the United States mails matter in the nature of propaganda denying that religious persecution exists in the Republic of Mexico, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition signed by officers and the executive board of Baltimore & Ohio Local Federation, No. 7, American Federation of Labor, Cumberland, Md., praying for the enactment of Senate bill 2862, providing a retirement system for aged railway employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the Franklin County (Mass.) Poultry Association, praying for inclusion of a provision for the protection of poultry and its products in pending legislation pertaining to amendment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Everett, Mass., protesting against the fixing of a 40-hour work schedule on a $12 per week pay basis in connection with the operation of the work-relief program, and favoring making the minimum wage for laborers on such work 50 cents per hour, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a letter from the Roxbury (Mass.) Board of Trade, enclosing copy of a letter by Samuel Hermanson, chairman of the improvement committee of the board, recently published in Boston newspapers, endorsing the adoption of a work-relief program to "wipe out the city slums", which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by St. Patrick's Holy Name Society, Lowell, Mass., favoring a congressional investigation of alleged religious persecution in the Republic of Mexico, and also favoring the withdrawal of the American Ambassador to that country, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from Mrs. I. K. E. Prager, president League of Jewish Women's Organizations, Allston, Mass., praying for the enactment of the revised so-called "Kerr bill", pertaining to the deportation of aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by United Council, No. 6, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Orleans, Mass., protesting against the enactment of the so-called "Kerr bill", pertaining to the deportation of aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered on Sunday, June 16, 1935, by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] at the grave of the late Robert Marion La Follette on the tenth anniversary of the late Senator's death.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ten years ago advocates of truly representative government were bewildered by the one, two, three call of death as it summoned in quick succession three men who had served so well the cause of the people against interests bent upon making government a mere instrument for their own enrichment. These three had played prominently on the stage of American political life, each in his own way but all to one cause. Though predatory interests would have paid well for knowledge enabling them to besmirch the names of these men, never once did their records permit successful attack. Their sincerity of purpose was never denied. To their States they brought honor and credit. Nebraska, North Dakota, and Wisconsin profited greatly by reason of them. Yet they were much more than representatives and servants of their States. Distinctly were they unselfish statesmen serving their country as truly and as bravely as any soldier ever served. Within space of but few days these men were taken from the ranks, first La Follette, then Ladd, then Bryan.

Those were sad days for great numbers of Americans. These departures were to us all as deaths in our own homes. Each had come to seem so much a part of our everyday lives. Indeed, each had actually made his life a contribution to our lives, our comfort, and our hopes as believers in the cause of government by man rather than wealth. Here were men unafraid of organized greed and power, quite unmindful of personal reward, completely ignoring all storm signals when serving the people.

Today, on the tenth anniversary of his death, we gather at the grave of one of these men—at the final resting place of Robert Marion La Follette—here among the people he loved and so unselfishly served.

PILGRIMAGE FOR INSPIRATION

Why are we here today? As curious men and women wanting to hear what someone will have to say; as idle folks with nothing better to do? No; emphatically no! Then, why are we here? To honor the memory of one who played so largely in effort to make mankind happier? Perhaps; but not that alone! Methinks we are here largely because of the inspiration which a pilgrimage of this kind affords—a pilgrimage to the last earthly contact of a body which in life gave so freely of himself that we and unborn generations might profit in greater liberty and opportunity, who in life accomplished so greatly of safeguards against those selfish forces who would deny us that liberty and opportunity. Freedom has required many engagements in her defense. Few, if any, fought more valiantly in that defense than did this great leader we honor today. So courageously and against such terrifying odds at times did he give battle in the cause of freedom that with great justification we could dedicate Lowell's lines to him:

Men whose boast it is that ye
Come of fathers brave and free,
If there breathe on earth a slave,
Are ye truly free and brave?
If ye do not feel the chain
When it works a brother's pain,
Are ye not base slaves indeed,
Slaves unworthy to be freed?

Is true freedom but to break
Fetters for our own dear sake
And, with leathern hearts, forget
That we owe mankind a debt?
No! True freedom is to share
All the chains our brothers wear,
And, with heart and hand, to be
Earnest to make others free!

They are slaves who fear to speak
For the fallen and the weak;
They are slaves who will not choose
Hatred, scoffing, and abuse;
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truth they needs must think,
They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

I am highly honored by the invitation which brings me here today. I can never hope for greater honor than in this opportunity to speak upon this occasion. But I find upon contemplation of the event not a desire to speak to you who gather about this grave, but instead, to speak to the spirit, the very actual spirit, of Robert Marion La Follette, and to speak to him of the renewed and enlarged confidence which the developments of each passing day instill in us who were and are his followers. Perhaps in thus addressing myself it shall fall to me to speak in some part what others would like to say at this very time. If that power is given me then can many of us honor his memory and pay our tribute to one who was never afraid to stand alone. And so, to that spirit I address myself.

SOUGHT TO PREVENT MADNESS

There is much I'd like to say to you today in praise of your generous contribution to me, to our country and to its people. I should like, could it but be more personal, to tell you of how great an inspiration was your life to me, then I should go on telling you how our increasing knowledge of truth is enlarging our respect and admiration of your leadership and your great courage. But of necessity, I must confine my remarks. So I speak quite alone of those days when you sought so strenuously to save your country and its people from a madness which cost so many heartaches, so many broken homes, so many wrecked lives, and such complete economic demoralization as finds us, 17 years after the armistice, still hopelessly struggling against frightful odds in the form of debt and tremendous concentration, just as you said would be the result of those hours of madness.

We all were told that though war was quite deplorable, it was equally quite necessary if we were to preserve elements of great merit. You wouldn't believe this. You said there were no possible compensations that could begin to offset the costs of war, and your life was made a round of misery because you dared to say so. You said in those hours:

"War is a terribly destructive force, even beyond the limits of the battle front and the war zones. Its influence involves the whole community. It warps men's judgment, distorts the true standard of patriotism, breeds distrust and suspicion among neighbors, inflames passions, encourages violence, develops abuse of power, tyrannizes over men and women even in the purely social relations of life, and terrifies whole communities into the most abject surrender of every right which is the heritage of free government."

What were the compensations of the last war to offset its destructive force?

Today there are millions asking that question. They thought war was going to "make the world safe for democracy", and now discover that democracy the world over has never been upon thinner ice than since the war. They thought the war was a "war to end war", and now awaken to the discovery that it but planted the seed for more war, and has been followed by the maddest race between nations in preparation for more war that civilization has ever witnessed in peace time. And your spirit rises up to ask, "Why didn't you listen to truth and reason before it was too late?" And our only answer to you is this, it will never be so easy to blind us to truth another time, thanks to you.

WAR FOR FAT PROFITS

In March of 1917 you wrote for your magazine lines which were to win for you first the curses of your fellowmen, but finally their praises. I must quote from those lines:

"Who shall then set limits of time or space upon its (war's) ravages! And for what? For commercial advantages and fat profits beneficial to a limited number of our dollar-scarred patriots, for neutral rights which were surrendered to the belligerents on one side during the first 3 months of the European war?"

What prophecy! Look to the facts of record now, 20 years after your declaration, 10 years after you left us.

What of your insistence that the war would be for commercial advantage and fat profits for the few?

Before me is a compilation from Moodie's Analysis showing the average annual profits of a group of American corporations during the four years of peace preceding the war alongside the annual average profit for the same corporations during the 4 war years. These speak for themselves of your wisdom:

	Average, 4 peace years	Average, 4 war years
United States Steel	$105,331,000	$239,653,000
Du Pont	6,902,000	58,076,000
Bethlehem Steel	6,840,000	49,427,000
Anaconda Copper	10,649,000	34,549,000
Utah Copper	5,776,000	21,622,000
American Smelting & Refining Co	11,566,000	18,602,000

	Peace years	Six war years
Republic Iron & Steel Co	$4,177,000	$17,548,000
International Mercantile Marine	6,690,000	14,229,000
Atlas Powder Co	485,000	2,374,000
American & British Manufacturing	172,000	325,000
Canadian Car & Foundry	1,335,000	2,201,000
Crocker Wheeler Co	206,000	666,000
Hercules Powder Co	1,271,000	7,430,000
Niles-Bement Pond	656,000	6,146,000
Scovill Manufacturing Co	655,000	7,678,000
General Motors	6,954,000	21,700,000

If further fulfillment of your prophecy were required, we would only need resort to the record revealing that in America alone the World War created 22,000 new millionaires—men and women who could not have had those millions except as millions were caused to bleed and die, except as homes and lives were broken, except as the masses were burdened with untold debt.

COMMERCE MORE IMPORTANT THAN NEUTRALITY

You said war would be for "commercial advantages." For this you were unmercifully flayed, often by the very forces that best knew that it was actually commercial advantage that was sought in our American declaration of war. But what does the record say of this today in your silence? Ah, could you but read and offer your comment upon that record!

It is the story of a titanic struggle in America for profit starting with the declaration of madness in Europe in 1914. It reveals the grab by Americans for profitable business which flowed steadily so long as the Morgans and other American bankers supplied the money with which the Allies could buy. The allied needs afforded Americans unlimited trade possibilities on a tremendously rising market. A great French leader, Andre Tardieu, wrote:

"Profits had swollen tenfold. The Allies had become the sole customer of the United States. Loans the Allies had obtained from New York banks swept the gold of Europe into American coffers. From that time on, whether desired or not, the victory of the Allies became essential to the United States."

It might have been added that this was sufficiently essential to drag us into the war, and that commercial advantage became at once of far greater importance than our neutrality.

Our trade with the Allies had increased between 1914 and 1916 to a point which found that business representing 88 percent of our total export trade. During the same period our bankers were financing this trade by loans of money and credit to the Allies. This easily carried to a point where America could not possibly remain neutral.

BANKERS' PROFITS DEMAND PROTECTION

Through all this ran the feeble and unintelligent effort of our Government to enforce an alleged strict neutrality. Our State Department was holding the trade in war supplies to the Allies a strictly neutral right. At the same time it was trying to establish that loans to the Allies was not a neutral act. But such an attitude could not long prevail. If the American gun and powder maker could get in on this blood money, why not the bankers, too? Morgan went to work financing the Allied trade through bank credits, until in 1915 they ceased to distinguish between credits and loans and floated great loans for the Allies until the total advanced reached into the billions.

In the early part of 1917 our bankers had exhausted their resources. Unless the great credit of the American people and the Nation could be tapped, the claims of the banks against the Allies could not be paid and the flow of business would have to stop! How well men succeeded in tapping this credit is too well known to need repeating. It is enough to remember that after we were into the war the bankers got what the Allies owed them, but the American Government never got back what it loaned the same Allies through the sale of Liberty bonds.

WAR TO AVERT PANIC

We didn't enter the war for the reasons we believe. We entered because of commercial interests, just as you so often insisted. If it was a war involving our honor, then it must be held that the credit and well-being of our bankers and our munitions makers is "our national honor."

Our Ambassador to England in those "neutrality" days, Walter Hines Page, dispatched a cablegram to his Government in Washington which most clearly reveals what it was that was moving us into war. Hear him:

"The financial inquiries made here reveal an international condition most alarming to the American financial and industrial outlook. * * * France and England must have a large enough credit in the United States to prevent the collapse of world trade and of the whole European finance.

"If we should go to war with Germany, the greatest help we could give the Allies would be such a credit. In this case our Government could, if it would, make a large investment in a Franco-British loan or might guarantee such a loan. * * *

"I think that the pressure of this approaching crisis has gone beyond the ability of the Morgan financial agency for the British and French Governments. * * *

"Perhaps our going to war is the only way in which our present preeminent trade position can be maintained and a panic averted. * * *"

You boldly criticized the thought of millions of bodies being thrown into the defense of these selfish commercial interests. For doing that, before and during the war, you were damned. Yet, after this same war, President Wilson said:

"Why, my fellow citizens, is there any man here or any woman, let me say is there any child here, who does not know that the seed of war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry? The real reason that the war that we have just finished took place was that Germany was afraid her commercial rivals were going to get the better of her, and the reason why some nations went into the war against Germany was that they thought Germany would get the commercial advantage of them. The seed of jealousy, the seed of the deep-seated hatred was hot, successful commercial and industrial rivalry.

"This war, in its inception was a commercial and industrial war. It was not a political war."

FRANKNESS BEFORE WAR IS NEEDED

Ah, the rulers of the world, the foreign offices, the State Departments, the Presidents and Kings and Czars and Kaisers know what the war was about all the time. It was only afterward that the people were informed why they had been fighting. There was fraud perpetrated by governments in hiding from their people the true commercial, not political, causes for which they were fighting. And you, with truth your foundation, were heard only to be cursed.

Why can't we be as frank before another war as you were—as frank before that war comes as Wilson was frank after the last one was over? Why can't we learn that if we are dragged into the wars of other nations again it will be by false neutrality, the sales and shipments of contraband, and the lure of the profits in them? And while leaders talk about our national honor in those hours, why don't we call a spade a spade and know that to them national honor means the right to go on making money out of a war or preparation for it?

SELFISHNESS BETRAYS DEMOCRACY

Ah, if we could but have your leadership today in building safeguards against repetition of the waste and heartache of our last experience in defense of our "national honor". In September of 1917 you said:

"Who is it, abroad over this country now, waving the flags and crying out for democracy in the loudest possible tones? It is business that is making money out of existing conditions. That is what it is."

Were you to voice such sentiment now you would find a far finer reception than greeted you when you spoke then. Hardly would you be threatened with impeachment at least!

WEALTH AND PATRIOTISM

You were declared to be most unworthy when you spoke before and during the war of a partnership between patriotism and profits. We can still hear you crying out:

"Of course—of course, I know that the fellows who are waving the flags of today most frantically, the bloated representatives of wealth, who are shouting loudest for democracy today, are trying to invest this particular time with a new form of democracy, a democracy that has attached to it as a cardinal principle not liberty, not equality, but profits!"

Today we know what you seemed to know years ago. We know well now what was meant by "making the world safe for democracy."

Profiteers are the loudest of patriots, except at taxpaying time. Their patriotism is reflected by the profits they can win, not by a desire quickly to win a war at least cost. Today we know that French-made and German-made munitions were exchanged by the two countries while they were engaged in bitter strife. We know, too, that they guarded against destroying each other's sources of munitions' raw material. We know that men are shot down by guns sold to their opponents by manufacturers of their own lands, manufacturers who insist upon their patriotism.

And we know, as well, that great American merchants refused to respond to the needs of their Government in time of war until they could be guaranteed profits for their service. The New York Shipbuilding Co., for instance, refused in the midst of war to respond to the Government's request for additional shipbuilding capacity to be provided for with Government money, because there was uncertainty as to what their profit for doing this would be.

The Du Ponts cry out against criticism of their 400 percent profit on invested capital during the war and insist that but for them and their service to the Allies our country would today be a German colony. Yet it was the same Du Ponts who, for 3 long months, while our men were bleeding and dying in the trenches, refused to honor the request of their Government to build additional powder manufacturing capacity with money to be furnished by the Government. The explanation of this refusal is now a matter of record. There was failure to agree upon what the Du Pont margin of profit should be for constructing the new plant.

So we think we know what you meant when you said:

"Wealth has never yet sacrificed itself on the altar of patriotism in any war. On the contrary, it has ever shown itself eager to take advantage of the misfortune which war always brings to the masses of the people. That has been true of every war we have had in this country and of every war in Europe of which I have any knowledge, and it is certainly true of the present war."

COST OF WAR

Again you spoke of the burdens and risks of war and were called a coward. Today we battle with those burdens. We thought during the war that it was bringing a new day and era of prosperity, but since we have come to learn how war was only accomplishing concentration of wealth and burdening unborn generations with debt.

We wonder now at our difficulty in combating the depression which war gave us, as though war ever left other than economic wreckage in its wake. We wish for larger monetary means to meet that depression and are reminded that if we but had the cost of that 4 years of war we could go forth, build homes costing $2,500 each on 5-acre plots of ground costing $100 per acre, equip them with $1,000 worth of furniture, and give such a home to every family in Russia, Italy, France, Belgium, England, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, Australia, Canada, and the United States; then give every city of 20,000 or more people in those same lands a $2,000,000 library, a $3,000,000 hospital, and a $10,000,000 university; that after doing all this if we would invest part of the balance of the cost of that war so as to bring a return of 5 percent per year we could use it to pay salaries of $1,000 annually to 125,000 teachers and 125,000 nurses; that after doing all this there would still be enough left to buy all the property existing in Germany and Belgium.

So, good friend and prophet, we look to this cost of war and understand something of what you meant when you said:

"For my own part, I look upon Europe as cursed with a contagious, a deadly plague whose spread threatens to devastate the civilized world. If it were, indeed, the 'black death' that was mowing down its millions of victims, instead of this more ghastly war, we should not hesitate to quarantine against it; we should keep our ships in their ports and our people at home without any hesitation whatsoever; all personal consideration, all thought of material loss or commercial inconvenience would fall before the necessity of protecting our people from being stricken with the dread disease."

WARNINGS OF THEIR GOOD NOW

Oh, how courageously you warned your country and its people, how well and wisely you advised during those hours when unseen hands were at work moving us into a conflict which all but destroyed us. Would that America had listened, maintained a strict neutrality while others fought over matters which were none of our business. But most who did listen cried "treason" and charged you with cowardice and lack of patriotism.

But having failed to heed your warning then, would that America would pause long enough in these mad hours of insane preparation for more war and weigh what you then advised along with the experience which so completely substantiated your contentions.

Did war teach us anything? How many entertain thought today that we won the "war to end war"? Who will undertake to say who was the winner of the last war except those lovers of democracy whose sense of democracy is chance to profit? What of this talk we hear to the effect that what we need to get out of this depression is another war? Does that signify that we learned anything from the World War?

DO NOTHING TO PREVENT REPETITION

Yet I am sure it can fairly be said that America is just as determined now to stay out of another war as it was determined to stay out 20 years ago. In spite of this determination, however, we have taken not one step to prevent repetition of that easy course pursued in dragging us into the last war.

Today there is as much danger of "neutrality" getting us into more war as it did get us into the World War, for not one step has been taken to strengthen our provisions of neutrality. Today finds not one thing done as yet to destroy the opportunity for profit from war which was such an irresistible temptation 20 years ago. Are we waiting for war to come before doing these things which experience dictates should be done if we care about our future? Then we but wait for hours when we will have neither time nor patience to do other than win the war.

PREPARE MEANS OF STAYING OUT OF WAR

We desperately need to change a dangerous habit of thought which is ours. From the cradle on through the years we are cautioned that in time of peace we should prepare for war. Why wouldn't it be much more advisable in time of peace to profit from experience and prepare means of staying out of more war? If we are to do this the call is first upon us to remove from every mind so far as we can the prospect of profit from more war, and to boldly face the issue of what we mean by neutral rights.

Of these issues you spoke to us and would speak again we are sure if you could. Of taking profit out of war you said:

"And there never was a time before in the history of the world when a war could be so justly and largely financed by taxation as this war. Why? Because never before in the history of the human race were great corporations making the enormous war profits that the corporations in this country have been making for the 3 years that the European war has been on and we have been at peace and those enormous profits warranted the assessment of the very highest rates, the very highest percentages of taxation against the war profiteers in order that this war should be properly financed."

Of such "neutrality" as is involved in letting Americans ride upon ships loaded with munitions for a belligerent nation, you said:

"I say this: That the comparatively small privilege of the right of an American citizen to ride on a munition-loaded ship, flying a foreign flag, is too small to involve this Government in the loss of millions and millions of lives."

And then, giving the lie to those who called you other than pro-American, you spoke clearly of the meaning of real neutrality when you said:

"I am opposed to the United States making war upon England for her ruthless violations of our neutral rights, just as I am opposed to making war upon Germany because of her relentless violation of our neutral rights."

I wonder if there might be cheer for your spirit in knowledge of the aggressive steps being taken now to cope with the problem of such neutrality as is to prevail in the event of more war and with the challenge which war profits afford. Would it mean anything to you to know that your words of 10 and 20 years ago were bearing fruit in the form of an awakening conscience to needs you so long urged?

Tremendous today is the response from all sections of the land to programs advanced to accomplish three definite purposes, namely, the accomplishment of stronger provisions of neutrality, of elimination of war profits, and of elimination of profit from programs of preparing for war.

NEUTRALITY PROGRAM

On Wednesday of this very week the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, which committee is honored by the able membership of your own son, will give consideration to three neutrality resolutions introduced as Senate Joint Resolutions 99, 100, and 120. These three make for a well-rounded-out program to afford security against such experience as our alleged neutrality of 20 years ago invited. Briefly these resolutions provide as follows:

First. A denial of American passports to Americans choosing to enter war zones in the ships of billigerents. This is virtual notice that Americans choosing to get into war zones shall do it without expectation that the American Army and Navy will follow with salve to spread upon their toes when they are stepped on.

Second. That there shall be no exportation of American munitions to nations at war and that no contraband shall be shipped in vessels carrying the American flag. This means that we cease wrapping the American flag about commerce intended for a nation at war and write finish to the game of making "national honor" mean the profits of men who seek gain from chiselling upon our neutrality.

Third. That there shall be no advance of loans or credits by Americans to any nation or the people of any nation engaged in war.

What might such neutrality save us if we had had it thus clearly defined back in 1914, 1915, and 1916?

TAKING PROFIT OUT OF WAR

The proposal to destroy the prospect of profit from more war and to provide the revenue with which to pay for the next war while it is being fought is in the form of a bill which was reported out by the Military Affairs Committee on Friday. This bill is the result of serious study by the Senate munitions committee. It provides drastic rates of taxation upon all incomes in time of war. It amounts to virtual confiscation of all individual incomes in excess of $10,000. Had the provisions of this bill been in effect during the World War they would have made the income of the Government exceed the outgo without borrowing one penny, just as you said it was possible to finance a war by taxing incomes during the war.

PROFIT OUT OF PREPARING FOR WAR

Today we see so mad an armament race on foot as cannot indicate other than grave consequences. We find merchants of preparation machinery and supplies resorting to the breeding of hates, fears, and suspicions to accomplish larger sales to afford larger profits. We find these merchants selling to their own countries as well as to those against whom those countries prepare for possible war. These merchants have made national defense a highly developed racket which in our own land has increased the annual bill of expense in its name during the years since the war by leaps and bounds to a point which finds America spending more money in preparation for more war than is being spent by any other nation on earth, and this only a few years after our "war to end war."

Clearly the call is upon the Government to produce more of its own national-defense machinery and to stop this game which finds American munitions makers selling their national-defense tools to all the world.

Success for this large program grows brighter each hour. Fulfillment of fondest hopes in this line could be had if only the American people would clearly voice their interest in and demand for such legislation as outlined.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO CARRY ON

It is you whom we honor today who gives us the inspiration to carry on in fields in which you pioneered, you who was called un-American, disloyal, traitor, trouble maker, underminer of democracy, pro-German, fool, knave, publicity hunter, liar, deceiver, for having dared to speak truth that one and all can know today to have been truth.

O Master, Lord and Ruler of all lands, give us this day the will, the desire, and the power to carry on where Robert Marion La Follette left off. Give us the light that will enable us to prevent for ourselves and our children another wasteful experience called war. Cause us to hear again this voice, now from the grave, urging us to those steps which will provide the necessary safeguards against men and interests whose knowledge of the profits from war and preparation for it blinds them to the desperate consequences of the satisfying of their appetites. Help us make truth even the words of those who idly and selfishly rallied a great public conscience to an alleged cause of making the world safe for democracy and of fighting to end war.

Here in this grave before us is one who gave much to the end that we might know the truth and prosper. Help us now to honor him by serving not only ourselves but our children and their children as builders like—

An old man, traveling a lone highway,
Came at the evening cold and gray,
To a chasm deep and wide.

The old man crossed in the twilight dim,
For the sullen stream held no fears for him.
But he turned when he reached the other side,
And builded a bridge to span the tide.

"Old man," cried a fellow pilgrim near,
"You are wasting your strength with building here;
Your journey will end with the ending day,
And you never again will pass this way.

"You have crossed the chasm deep and wide.
Why build you a bridge at eventide?"
And the builder raised his old gray head:
"Good friend, on the path I have come," he said,
"There followeth after me today
A youth whose feet will pass this way.

"This stream, which has been as naught to me,
To that fair-haired boy may a pitfall be:
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim—
Good friend, I am building this bridge for him."

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION—SPEECH BY A. MITCHELL PALMER

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech delivered by Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, at Harrisburg, Pa., on June 18, 1935, on the subject of amending the Constitution.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From New York Times, June 19, 1935]

Shortly after the National Industrial Recovery Act was invalidated by the Supreme Court for constitutional reasons, President Roosevelt made some comment on the decision and its effect which has been widely quoted and much discussed.

The Court had found the act unconstitutional for two reasons: First, it was a delegation of legislative power to the Executive; and, second, it comprised within its bounds the regulation of intrastate commerce, whereas the Constitution expressly restricts the power of Congress to the regulation of interstate commerce.

The President, after declaring that the first of these reasons was not important, for there was no intention to delegate the law-making power to the Executive, went on to say that the "Court has practically gone back to the old Knight case of 1885, which limited interstate commerce to goods in transit. Since then the Court has made the interstate-commerce clause apply to a great many things not only in transit, but affecting interstate commerce. When the Constitution was written the country was in the horse-and-buggy stage. There was no interstate commerce to speak of * * * there was no problem of unemployment or buying power, no national social questions."

PRESIDENT'S CONCLUSION RECALLED

He concluded, therefore, that the people "have got to decide—not this autumn or this winter, but over a period of 5 or 10 years—if they are going to relegate to the States control of social, economic, and working conditions. They must decide whether to restore to the Government the powers that every other national government has. This is the biggest question before the country in years, as big as the choice between war and peace. * * * If the implications of the Supreme Court's decision are carried to their logical conclusion they would strip the Government of almost all its powers."

In all this he followed the declaration of a distinguished predecessor, Theodore Roosevelt, who said:

"It is the narrow construction of the powers of the National Government which in our democracy has proved the chief means of limiting the national power to cut out abuses, and which is now the chief bulwark of those great interests which oppose and dread any attempt to place them under efficient Government control."

REGRETS NARROW CONSTRUCTION

It is a nice question about which laymen will honestly differ whether the construction placed on interstate commerce by the Supreme Court was a necessary conclusion from either the words of the Constitution or past decisions.

Without questioning the decision, a great many good citizens believe that the Court might have given the clause the broad construction essential to our economic stability and prosperity. There is some foundation for the opinion which has been widely expressed that in the past where property rights have been in issue the Court seems to have been broad and liberal in its construction of the commerce clause, but where human rights are concerned it has been in the habit of giving interstate commerce the narrowest possible interpretation.

After the President's dramatic utterance many newspapers and political leaders who had always bitterly fought the traditional Jeffersonian and Democratic idea of local government and State rights suddenly became horrified at the possibility of their dreams coming true. They became followers of Jefferson overnight. They abandoned the theory of a strong Federal Government and professed the most solicitous consideration for the rights of States in managing their own affairs. They thought they saw the chance to accuse the President of all the errors of which they themselves had been guilty for generations.

ROOSEVELT'S VIEW COMMON SENSE

The two most notable contributions to this campaign so far are found in the radio address of Senator BORAH, of Idaho, and the speech of former Governor Lowden, of Illinois, before the "grass roots" Republican convention at Springfield. Both of them indulged in well-worn and time-honored methods of political argument, but neither was able to establish that the President did anything else than speak the average man's common-sense reaction to the Supreme Court's decision.

That the President was entirely sound in his fundamental idea nobody who has read the history of his country, even in the most desultory fashion, can deny. Economic and social conditions in this country have radically changed since the framers of the Constitution met in Philadelphia in 1787. This is too obvious to require proof.

There was practically no interstate commerce in those days; in fact, there was but very little communication between the States—certainly nothing approaching the present-day methods of commerce and communication.

When the colonists, living in sparsely settled communities, chiefly on farms, stretching along the Atlantic Coast from Massachusetts Bay to where Georgia touches the Atlantic, desired to test the sentiment of their associates relative to the cause of independence, they were obliged to resort to "committees of correspondence" and through the medium of letters which traveled by horseback, stage coach, or clipper ship, they were able after many months to exchange views.

They were unable, except at extraordinary expense, time and labor, to get together in person to discuss these views. Thomas Jefferson at Charlottesville and John Adams at Boston exchanged letters throughout all their lives, discussing all the public questions then pending. It took several weeks for Mr. Jefferson to get back Mr. Adams's reaction to one of his arguments. Today a Jefferson in Virginia and an Adams in Massachusetts may exchance their ideas almost instantaneously.

In those days the wheat from Mount Vernon was sent by ship whose only propelling power was a favorable wind, down the Potomac and up the Chesapeake to Baltimore. Some weeks later General Washington learned what his wheat had brought. Today the wheat farmer in the far West knows every day when he picks up his newspaper or tunes in on his radio what his wheat is worth at the moment in every market of the world.

Then it mattered not at all to Massachusetts and New York what the colonist farmers of the southland might do with the products of their fields, for they never came into active competition with those of the Northern States. Today the cost of labor and materials which enter into the finished product manufactured in Georgia or California is reflected in the price which the same or a similar product may sell for in New York or Boston.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE CHANGED

The advance of science and the progress of invention have made interstate commerce a thing as different from what it was in 1787 as the civilization of the savage tribes of darkest Africa is different from that of Paris, London, or Boston. It was to this only that the President called the attention of the country. If the commerce clause of the Constitution could speak in words today, it might well employ the striking language of the poem of Oliver Wendell Holmes:

"And if I should live to be,
The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring.
Let them laugh as I do now
At the old forsaken bough
Where I cling."

The President's suggestion was that this is a democracy, where the people rule, and all branches of the Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—are but the servants of the ruling power. The decisions of these servants may be overruled, as they have been time and again in the country's history, by the mandate of the people's will. This doctrine is neither an attack upon the Constitution nor criticism of any of the branches of the Government. It is pure straight constitutional doctrine, for the people wrote it into the fundamental law which they ordained and established at the beginning of our Union and the founding of our Nation.

SAYS BORAH BUILT STRAW MAN

Senator BORAH, in his self-appointed role of savior of the Constitution, framed the draft of an amendment which he said would be necessary to meet the President's idea. This amendment proposed to give legislative power to the Congress and to such executive commissions as should be created from time to time.

This is the familiar form of argument called by logicians the reducio ad absurdum. In more common parlance it may be said that the distinguished Senator carefully built a man of straw and then riddled the result of his handiwork with 10-inch guns. Nobody has ever suggested any amendment to the Constitution which would vest the Executive with legislative power, and, so far as I know, no man who has given the matter a moment's thought has ever considered such a proposition. It is a preposterous suggestion.

Governor Lowden, who emerged from a well-earned obscurity to sound the keynote for the 1936 Presidential campaign, springs to the defense of the menaced Constitution in more direct fashion. He fears the destruction of local self-government, the abolition of the Bill of Rights, and the end of liberty in the United States.

He says: "The preservation of the basic principles of the Constitution; this is the supreme issue of the hour. * * * Upon this great issue the Republican Party must take the lead. It would be false to its traditions and its history if it faltered now. Minor factional and sectional differences must disappear."

The desire to wipe out factional differences in the Republican Party in this sad hour of its deep submergence in the dark waters of defeat is readily understandable, but Mr. Lowden will find that when he bases it upon the purpose of preserving the Constitution there will be no differences within or without his party to combat him. All parties and all patriotic citizens desire and intend at all hazards to preserve our constitutional rights and liberties.

The question is not whether we shall preserve our Constitution. That is nowhere disputed. The question is whether the Constitution shall be pickled in its original liquor and stubbornly preserved in its pristine form, or whether it shall be preserved in the manner in which its framers intended to meet the changing demands of the new growth and development of a great country.

The framers plainly foresaw that the Constitution would have to be changed from time to time. The very Bill of Rights about which Governor Lowden is so much concerned is contained in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, and other highly important amendments have been forced by the people's will to meet interpretations which did not satisfy them when uttered.

The people have not only changed the Constitution to meet the decisions reached in the arbitrament of war and to conform to new economic conditions growing out of the rapid progress of our changing civilization, but they once amended the Constitution to make "an experiment, noble in motive", and the experiment having failed they again changed the Constitution to write an acknowledgment of the failure into that instrument.

MOST FAR-SEEING STATESMAN

It is very likely true, as recently stated by one of the political wiseacres of the time, "that an amendment to turn over to the National Government omnipotent powers to regulate wages, hours, working conditions, trade practices and prices would not be ratified by 10 American States", but the straw-grasping politicians who ascribe such a purpose to the President forget what everybody else in the world recognizes, that is, not only is Franklin D. Roosevelt the most far-seeing statesman among all the leaders of the world's thought but also he is the wisest politician of his time.

Such a specific amendment has never been hinted at by him. But it may be that a restatement of the commerce clause of the Constitution in twentieth century language might become necessary to effectuate the intent of the framers, who never designed that their work should be forever construed by the dim candlelight of the eighteenth century.

The fathers intended to protect every State in its right to achieve social, economic, and industrial progress, and only if that right is respected will the purpose of the Constitution be accomplished. If present-day interpretations violate that intent they will destroy the most sacred of State rights. No amendment will be considered which would not meet with the approval of the framers if they were here now to write it into their own instrument in the glare of the electric light of a modern civilization.

To suggest changes in the Constitution is not an attack upon the Constitution. To make changes is not unconstitutional. In the very instrument itself, perhaps the most carefully thought out and skillfully worded article is that which reserved to the people themselves, the makers of the Constitution, the sole right to alter it.

CRITICISM CALLED "FLAREBACK"

All this criticism of the liberty to suggest amendments and the right of the people to make them if they see fit is a flareback from the archaic, repudiated, and defeated theory argued strenuously on both sides in the early days of the Republic, that the Constitution is a compact between the States with which the people had naught to do and which, therefore, presumably the people have no right to alter.

This was the argument presented by Calhoun and Toombs and Stephens and personified by Jefferson Davis. We thought that argument was ended at Appomatox.

The Supreme Court has never said that the Constitution is a compact between the States. On the contrary, in every decision of that great Court from 1793 down to this hour, whenever the question has been raised, it has been specifically declared to be not a compact between the States but a covenant of the people with themselves for their own government.

Away back in 1793 Mr. Chief Justice Jay said:

"Here we see the people acting as sovereigns of the whole country; and in the language of sovereignty; establishing a Constitution by which it was their will that the State governments should be bound and to which the State constitutions should be made to conform. Every State constitution is a compact made by and between the citizens of a State to govern themselves in a certain manner, and the Constitution of the United States is likewise a compact made by the people of the United States to govern themselves as to general objects in a certain manner."

And again in 1816 the great Story said:

"The Constitution of the United States was ordained and established not by the States in their sovereign capacities, but emphatically, as the preamble of the Constitution declares, by 'the people of the United States.' There can be no doubt that it was competent for the people to invest the General Government with all the powers which they might deem proper and necessary, to extend or restrain these powers according to their own good pleasure, and to give them a paramount and supreme authority.

"As little doubt can there be that the people had a right to prohibit to the States the exercise of any powers which were in their judgment incompatible with the objects of the general compact; to make the powers of the State governments, in given cases, subordinate to those of the Nation; or to reserve to themselves those sovereign authorities which they might not choose to delegate to either.

"The Constitution was not, therefore, necessarily carved out of existing State sovereignties nor a surrender of powers already existing in State institutions, for the powers of the States depend upon their own constitutions, and the people of every State had the right to modify and restrain them according to their own views of policy or principle.

"The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people in framing this great charter of our liberties to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that this would be a perilous and difficult, if not an impracticable, task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence.

"It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications which, at the present, might seem salutary might, in the end, prove the overthrow of the system itself."

BECK'S FORMER STATEMENTS CITED

And yet we find, despite the decision following the exercise of great national power by war and the repeated declarations of the highest court in the land, the old doctrine, long dead and buried, has been resurrected by no less a constitutional authority than Mr. James M. Beck, who, by the way, never allowed his veneration for the Constitution to prevent him, though a resident of New York, from representing a Philadelphia district in Congress. So late as in the year 1932, in an address before the House of Representatives at Washington, Mr. Beck said "that if every State of the Union were to assemble tomorrow and unanimously agree, without any action of Congress, that they would change the Constitution, they could change it by such unanimous consent. Who could object, if all agreed?" The answer is nobody—except the people.

And again he said:

"Therefore, bear in mind the legal metaphysics of this question that while the Supreme Court speaks of the source of ratifying power being in the Constitution, the power of the constituent States to determine whether they will or will not ratify an amendment is antecedent to the Constitution and grows out of their nature as sovereign States that created a compact by their own voluntary act."

And further:

"Remember, gentlemen, what I said before, that the power of the State to ratify an amendment to the Constitution, while as to the method of its exercising is a grant of constitutional power, yet it has by reason of its own reserved rights the ultimate right to determine whether the compact into which it entered shall be changed."

GOVERNMENT BY DEAD HANDS

This utterly false doctrine, that the Constitution is a compact between the States, is the major premise in every argument that has been made or ever can be made to support the theory that the Constitution is sacred and untouchable. The people who framed the Constitution meant it to be neither of those things. They meant it to be changed when necessary to conform to the will of the majority. The only condition necessary to a change was that it should be submitted to and passed upon by the people themselves. Thus, the right to change the Constitution is the very foundation of popular government. Without it the people do not rule.

Those who argue now that the Constitution is sacrosanct and, though times may change as the world goes on, must remain always as it was written, are insisting that this people of 130,000,000 souls, stretching its civilization over a territory undreamed of by the fathers, living under conditions which could by no human possibility have been visualized by the framers of the Constitution, wise and foreseeing as they were, shall be governed not by themselves but by a dead hand reaching out of the darkness of the eighteenth century.

In my judgment, the most significant thing about the Constitution is this: It framed a representative democracy by an instrument almost perfect in its structure; but it provided that any alterations of that instrument must be made by methods which the people devise, which amounted approximately to a pure democracy.

RIGHT TO CHANGE RESERVED

The people themselves ordained and established this representative democracy and the people themselves, without imposing any power or responsibility upon the machinery of representative democracy, reserved the right to alter it. Neither the Federal Government nor the States, jointly or separately, unanimously or by a majority, can change the Constitution of the United States. It is purely a popular function. Therefore, to suggest that the people should consider the alteration of the Constitution is merely the suggestion of a popular referendum on the question of what the fundamental law shall be. It raises the issue, Shall the people rule?

It is true that in article V of the Constitution, relating to amendments, the people gave to Congress the power to propose amendments, and by the same article they gave to the legislatures the power to ratify amendments. But the Congress is not the Federal Government. The legislatures are not the States. What the people did was to select one branch of the Federal Government as their agent for proposing amendments and one branch of the State governments as their agent for ratifying amendments. But they were only the people's agents. Even these they did not wholly trust, for by a skillful use of words, never since equaled in legislative enactments, they devised alternatives which would assure to them the right to alter the Constitution if these agents should prove recalcitrant to the popular will.

ALTERNATIVE METHODS FOR ACTION

As an alternative method of proposal of amendments they provided that upon the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States the Congress "shall call a national convention to propose amendments." This left the Congress without discretion in the matter, but required it to call a convention to propose an amendment if the people through their agents, the legislatures, so required. And as an alternative method of ratification, in case legislatures might not truly represent the popular thought, they provided that the Congress might submit the amendment for ratification to "convention in" the States.

The alternative of calling a national convention to propose an amendment has never been resorted to in the history of the Republic.

The alternative method of ratification, namely, by conventions in the States, has been employed but once, when in 1933 the Congress submitted the so-called "repeal amendment" to conventions in the States. Even then the Congress did not comply with the constitutional intent, which was to make the convention system entirely separate from and unassociated with the legislatures. The Congress permitted these conventions to be called by the States.

Although it is doubtless true that the popular will was carried out in respect to this amendment, it was not carried out in the carefully guarded manner which the framers of the Constitution had designed to make certain that the States should not interfere with the prerogative of the people themselves. The Congress should have called these conventions into being, exactly as it must call a national convention if it receives the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States for such national conventions to propose an amendment.

INTERPRETS INTENT OF FRAMERS

This intent of the framers clearly appears from the language of article V, which provides that proposed amendments "shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

It has come to be generally accepted that the framers of the Constitution used no language without a definite purpose in mind. If they had intended that amendments should always be in the control of the legislators, why did they provide for conventions at all? For it is obvious that the constitutional method of ratification by conventions could be entirely nullified by the legislatures of the States either by refusing to call the convention, by delaying action, or by legislation which by a gerrymandering of districts or otherwise would make these conventions anything but representative of popular will. The net result would be that only one method of ratification, that by the legislatures, would have been provided.

In the Constitution every word must be given a meaning. Why did the framers of the Constitution say "legislatures of 'and' conventions in" the States? There is a vast difference between "of" and "in." "Of" denotes a possessive character as "belonging to", "organized by", or "chosen for" and is much larger in its scope than "in", which refers to location and nothing else.

STUDIED USE OF WORDS NOTED

The studied use of these two propositions plainly indicates a purpose that the two methods should be entirely distinct, neither dependent upon nor to be controlled by the other. The framers may have had in mind the very situation which is now generally (though mistakenly) believed to exist (as stated by a former Attorney General of the United States)—"ratification by State conventions obviously takes more time than ratification by State legislatures."

It seems clear that the chief purpose of the framers of the Constitution was that the will of the people should be promptly determined and that it should not be thwarted by legislative bodies of the States. They took care of this possibility by retaining the power in the Congress to employ the convention system, the only constitutional restriction upon the action of the Congress being that these conventions should be held in the several States.

One of these methods might be called the "slow" method, dependent for results entirely upon the will of the legislatures; the other the "quick" method, by which the Congress might put the matter directly up to the people by creating conventions without intervention of the legislatures.

POINTS TO POSSIBLE EMERGENCY

It is conceivable that a situation might arise when the very existence of the Government might depend upon the immediate amendment of the Constitution. Under such circumstances must the Government make its own life dependent upon the will of the legislatures elected by the people for other purposes, or can it submit the question directly to the people, by whom and for whom the Constitution was written to create and preserve the Federal Government?

A striking illustration of the wisdom of the fathers in providing this alternative method of ratification is presented by the situation in our own State of Pennsylvania today. In 1934, by a political revolution unprecedented in our history, the people of this State turned from the party of reaction to the new deal.

They sent to the Senate of the United States one of Pennsylvania's able and experienced sons with the express understanding that he would support the President's plans 100 percent, a pledge which he has so faithfully kept that he has already become a strong leader in that body.

They placed in the Governor's chair another loyal and progressive citizen, who, despite desperate opposition, had with consummate skill and undaunted courage, already made a reputation for fidelity to his trust unequaled in any State.

Yet, despite this plain mandate of the people and the popular acclaim for the public servants who have faithfully executed it, if a constitutional amendment, which might be demanded by a vast majority of our people, were now submitted to the legislature for ratification, it would immediately reach the electric chair of the hold-over Senate, which still listens to its old master's voice.

WAY TO EXPRESS POPULAR WILL

By no other system than a popular convention could the popular will in such case be translated into law. By such a system dilatory and obstructive tactics would be swept aside, for the Congress could call such a convention to meet in the near future on a fixed date.

From all this it seems plain that the wise men who framed the Constitution made certain that it should never die from disease or old age. They settled the means by which it should remain forever quick with life.

There is no thought in any responsible quarters of wiping out State lines or interfering with local government, except so far as it may be necessary in present conditions to make good the immortal language of the preamble, which declared that the people ordained and established it "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity."

Those who would amend the Constitution now to conform to that purpose are the real defenders and preservers of that great instrument, and those who would restrain the people from exercising their will are not only the would-be destroyers of popular government but they are also the real enemies of the Constitution, for they assert that the Constitution as written, including the power to alter it, shall no longer serve its God-given purpose. It is they who would tear down the structure of the fathers who builded for all time a framework of government which would answer the prayer of Lincoln, uttered on Pennsylvania soil, in the midst of the greatest trial our country has ever suffered, "that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

ATTITUDE OF HOLDING COMPANIES TOWARD REGULATION BILL

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Daily News of this date entitled "Holding Companies Attack Roosevelt."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Daily News, June 20, 1935]

We see in various papers a striking advertisement, signed by the Associated Gas & Electric System and captioned "Last Chance for Utility Investors." The News didn't carry this ad, but we are glad to summarize it here.

The ad says millions of American citizens' investments in power companies are jeopardized by the Wheeler-Rayburn bill to rub out the intermediate holding company racket in 7 years. It accuses President Roosevelt of having used the $4,880,000,000 relief fund as a patronage club to jam the bill through the Senate, and implies that he will do the same when the bill comes before the House. It beseeches everybody to write his Congressman to vote against the bill, as a long step toward Government ownership and operation of all the electric and gas companies. And it contains an inset letter from an alleged 78-year-old lady in Pennsylvania to her Congressman, begging him to vote against House bill no. 5423 and not to let Uncle Sam take away her pitiful little utility dividends, which she claims to have earned, and much prefers to an old-age pension.

We question the wisdom of the utilities in thus attacking the President, in view of his popularity and of what the public has been learning these last few years about the utilities.

WORKINGS OF THE RACKET

Insull taught the public its first and biggest holding company lesson at a cost of some $110,000,000 to hundreds of thousands of investors, including some widows and orphans.

Locally, we've been learning things like these of late:

Consolidated Gas is 37 percent water.

Consolidated Gas has invested $29,300,000 since 1925 in its subsidiary, Westchester Lighting Co., and has taken out more than $27,000,000 in dividends, or more than 93 percent, in the same period. Hence, Westchester County's fantastic electricity rates.

Long Island Lighting, captained by Ellis L. Phillips, has performed numerous stock split-ups and inside sales which have made millionaires of its handful of stockholders—the net result being that the New York State Power Authority calls Long Island power rates at least 50 percent too high.

These are samples. The intermediate holding company game is a racket, as truly as the poultry, policy, and fish rackets are rackets. Insiders in the intermediate companies skim off $3 out of every $7 earned by the producing companies in the chain—and those insiders are not widows or orphans. The widow-orphan money is mainly in the producing power companies unaffected by this bill.

Because it is a rich, delightful racket, yielding yachts and grouse shooting in Scotland and vacations at Deauville to its practitioners, they will not let go without a terrific fight. The ad above digested is one sample of these men's efforts to drum up public opinion against the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, and against the President, who wants that bill made law.

These men and their forerunners in high finance have won every fight of this kind up to now. We'll see if they can win against President Roosevelt.

SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. NEELY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Capper	Glass	McCarran
Ashurst	Caraway	Gore	McGill
Austin	Chavez	Guffey	McKellar
Bachman	Clark	Hale	McNary
Bailey	Connally	Harrison	Maloney
Bankhead	Coolidge	Hastings	Metcalf
Barkley	Copeland	Hatch	Minton
Bilbo	Costigan	Hayden	Moore
Black	Davis	Johnson	Murphy
Bone	Dieterich	Keyes	Murray
Borah	Donahey	King	Neely
Brown	Duffy	La Follette	Norris
Bulkley	Fletcher	Lewis	Nye
Bulow	Frazier	Logan	O'Mahoney
Burke	George	Lonergan	Overton
Byrd	Gerry	Long	Pittman
Byrnes	Gibson	McAdoo	Radcliffe

Reynolds	Sheppard	Townsend	Van Nuys
Robinson	Shipstead	Trammell	Wagner
Russell	Smith	Truman	Walsh
Schall	Steiwer	Tydings	Wheeler
Schwellenbach	Thomas, Okla.	Vandenberg	White

Mr. VANDENBERG. I announce the absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] on account of illness, and I ask that the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], caused by important public business.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Senate bill 2367, the so-called "Bankhead farm-tenancy bill", is before the Senate.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I call up the Holt election-contest case, and ask that the Senate proceed with that case until it shall have been concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia may present his colleague at the Vice President's desk to take the oath of office. From the parliamentary standpoint, that is all the Chair knows about it at the present time.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I think it was understood that the Senator from West Virginia would not present his colleague to take the oath until the matter had been discussed and settled.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, Mr. President, in order that there may be something before the Senate, I move that the oath be administered to Senator-elect HOLT.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was about to ask for the consideration of the formal resolution reported by me from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well, then; I withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution reported by the Senator from Georgia from the Committee on Privileges and Elections will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 155), as follows:

Resolved, That RUSH D. HOLT is entitled to his seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of West Virginia, it appearing that he was 30 years of age at the time when he presented himself to the Senate to take the oath and to assume the duties of the office.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia desire the floor?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, Mr. President; I desire to speak on the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is recognized, he having submitted the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to proceed at this time, this being a highly privileged matter.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire at some time to offer a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, and I was wondering whether that may be done now or may be done later, depending upon what the Senator from Georgia desires.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield for the purpose of allowing the proposed substitute resolution to be offered.

Mr. HASTINGS. As a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Delaware will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the election of RUSH D. HOLT to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having attained the age of 30 years at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the parliamentary situation to be that the Senator from Georgia has submitted a resolution for which the Senator from Delaware has offered a substitute. So the question will come on agreeing to the resolution presented by the Senator from Delaware as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this is a highly privileged matter. The Committee on Privileges and Elections has submitted a majority report, which has been printed and is on the desk of each Senator. Minority views have also been submitted by certain members of the Privileges and Elections Committee. Those views also are printed and are before Senators.

Mr. President, this is a matter of very great importance; the issue raised is of primary importance. The principal issue, the one upon which the Senate unquestionably will pass directly, and the controlling issue, is one of first impression, so far as the Senate is concerned, upon the precise facts presented in this case.

In the West Virginia primary election of August 8, 1934, RUSH D. HOLT was declared the nominee of the Democratic Party and the then sitting Senator, Henry D. Hatfield, was declared to be the nominee of the Republican Party for the office of United States Senator from the State of West Virginia. In the general election on November 7, 1934, RUSH D. HOLT received 349,882 votes and Henry D. Hatfield 281,756 votes. The secretary of state of West Virginia duly certified the result of the election to the Governor, who in turn certified in due form the election of RUSH D. HOLT to the Senate of the United States for the term beginning January 3, 1935. The certificate of the Governor of West Virginia was duly transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate before the beginning of the Seventy-fourth Congress, which convened January 3, 1935.

In April 1935 Henry D. Hatfield presented a petition in the nature of a protest and contest, in which he alleged that the election of RUSH D. HOLT was void, and raised certain questions with respect to the regularity of the election. He also claimed that he should be seated as a Senator from West Virginia upon the ground that he received the next highest number of legal votes cast in the November election; that the election of HOLT being void, he was entitled to the seat.

Subsequently a large number of citizens of the State of West Virginia filed with the Senate a memorial, in which it was alleged that the election of RUSH D. HOLT was void, and in which other allegations were made, based upon alleged irregularities in the certificate filed by RUSH D. HOLT in the primary election of August 8, 1934.

Both the petition of Henry D. Hatfield and the memorial of the citizens of the State of West Virginia were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Both the petition of Hatfield and the memorial of the citizens of the State of West Virginia raised primarily the question of the age qualification of RUSH D. HOLT. It was alleged in both the petition and the memorial that RUSH D. HOLT was born on June 19, 1905; that he was not, therefore, 30 years of age at the time of the election in November 1934, nor at the commencement of the term for which he was elected, to wit, January 3, 1935. It is therefore claimed that the election of HOLT was void because he failed to meet the constitutional age requirement as provided in clause 3, section 3, article I, of the Constitution.

It was also averred that the certificate required by the election laws of the State of West Virginia to be filed by every candidate for office in the primary election was not attested by or acknowledged before an officer of the county in which the certificate purported to have been executed. Upon that issue the evidence is not in dispute. It appears that the officer before whom the certificate was acknowledged was not in fact an officer of the particular county stated in the caption of the certificate. It also appears that he was an officer authorized under the laws of the State of West Virginia to administer oaths, and that he held a commission as notary public for the State at large.

This certificate was required to be filed as a prerequisite to becoming a candidate in the primary election of 1934.

Your committee are of the opinion, and upon that point I believe there is no difference of opinion, that the particular contention made regarding the attestation of RUSH D. HOLT'S signature is of no significance or consequence, for the reason that the certificate was in fact made or acknowledged, and for the additional reason that whether the officer who purported to have acknowledged it was in fact an officer of the county in which the certificate purported to have been made, he was an officer of the State at large. In fact, under the undisputed evidence, the certificate was not executed in the county stated in the caption of the certificate, but was executed in another county.

Moreover, no exception whatever was taken to the certificate or to its sufficiency, and the name of RUSH D. HOLT was placed upon the ticket of the Democratic Party in the primary election of August 1934, and no exception whatever was made to the appearance of the name of RUSH D. HOLT upon the ticket as a candidate of the Democratic Party for United States Senator from the State of West Virginia in the general election of November 11, 1934. Therefore, the objection here raised seems to be without substantial merit.

The certificate required of every candidate under the primary laws of the State of West Virginia contained the statement, "I am eligible for the office" for which the candidate offered himself, and the further statement in the certificate that "I am a candidate for the office in good faith." It is objected, inasmuch as he had not reached the age of 30 and could not attain the age of 30 prior to June 19, 1935, that Mr. HOLT made an untrue statement and that he could not in good conscience say that he was a candidate in good faith as the certificate required.

I believe upon this point there is no serious difference of opinion. Your committee are of the opinion that, on the undisputed evidence in the case, RUSH D. HOLT was merely stating his view, his view both of law and of fact, and that even if he had drawn an erroneous conclusion, no imputation of bad faith could be drawn in the case, and certainly no such implication of bad faith as would justify the Senate in saying that he should not for that reason be entitled to take his seat.

Your committee have been influenced in reaching its decision upon that question because it appeared from the undisputed evidence that RUSH D. HOLT from the opening of his primary campaign, on the platform, in public discussion, and in the press of the State, at no time denied the fact that he was born on the 19th day of June 1905, and that even if he had drawn an erroneous conclusion of law, or conclusion of law and of fact, it would be of no consequence as far as seating him in this present case is concerned.

The committee is also of the opinion—and upon that point in the case there is no division among the Members—that even if RUSH D. HOLT is held to be ineligible to take a seat in the Senate, and even if his election is void, nevertheless Henry D. Hatfield is not entitled to the seat, upon the broad, generally recognized principle that the ineligibility of a majority candidate does not entitle the candidate receiving the next highest number of legal votes cast in the election to the office.

So, Mr. President, the important issue before the Senate involves this question: As of what date is the age qualification for a Senator provided for in article I, section 3, paragraph 3, of the Constitution to be determined? That is, is it to be determined as of the date of the election, or is it to be determined as of the date of the beginning of the term of office for which the Senator was elected; or is it to be determined as of the date when the Senator-elect presents himself and demands the right to take the seat and assume the duties of his office?

Article I, section 3, paragraph 3, of the Constitution reads as follows:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

There are other pertinent provisions in the Constitution to which attention will be directed.

It will be noted that this particular paragraph is really a paragraph of two sentences. The first sentence is complete within itself; that is—

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been 9 years a citizen of the United States.

The second sentence or clause is complete but for the subject:

> And who shall not—

That is to say, no person shall be a Senator who shall not—> when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

It is the opinion of the majority of the committee that the words "when elected", appearing as they do in the middle of the second sentence or clause, must be held as a mere rule of grammar, as a mere rule of reason, to modify the word "person" which appears in the first clause or sentence; that the words "when elected" have no reference to the verbs used in the first sentence, or the first two clauses which compose a complete sentence in the particular paragraph.

It will be noted that this particular clause of the Constitution declares that "No person shall be a Senator." It is the view of your committee that the reference is to actual senatorship, and not to potential senatorship. It is the view of your committee that the invitation to the Senate, and the obligation resting upon the Senate, is to deal with the matter in the present tense.

It may be contended that RUSH D. HOLT became a Senator upon the date of his election. That position is hardly tenable; and I do not think it will be taken—certainly not by the members of the committee who have filed minority reports.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I would rather not yield just at this point.

Mr. LONG. I simply desire to say that there is a decision of a United States court on that subject.

Mr. GEORGE. I would rather not yield just at this point. The majority of the committee believe that the clause itself negatives the idea, completely contradicts the theory, that a person is, when elected, on the date of his election, a Senator in the Congress of the United States.

It will be noted that in the middle of the second sentence or clause, dealing with the question of habitancy, the words "when elected" are used; that is to say, that—

> No person shall be a Senator * * * who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

There would be no purpose whatever in using the words "when elected" if a person who was a candidate for the Senate became a Senator on the date of his election.

Beyond all question, the person on the date when elected cannot be held to be a Senator within the meaning of this clause in the Constitution.

It may be said, Mr. President—and that is the view expressed by those who have filed minority reports, and by those who, through the history of the Senate itself, have taken a contrary view—that, nevertheless, a Senator-elect becomes a Senator at the commencement of the term of office to which he was elected. Upon that question I desire to say that it is not my view that the mere formality of an oath converts a Senator-elect into an actual Senator, or a Senator within the meaning of clause 3 of section 3 of article I of the Constitution. The Constitution does require that all Senators, Members of the Congress, and certain State officers, shall take an oath to support the Constitution. That is a constitutional requirement. As a matter of fact, until the First Congress met there was no prescribed form of oath, and there could not be until the Congress prescribed it.

As a matter of fact, if through inadvertence or misadventure a Senator-elect should be allowed to enter the Senate, should be enrolled, should take his seat, and should participate in the deliberations of the Senate, I do not believe it could be contended with reason or force that the mere failure to take the oath interfered essentially with the character of the person as a Senator in the Congress of the United States. Upon that point I am expressing my own view. If the Senator-elect should willfully and intentionally refuse to take the oath, of course it is perfectly manifest that the Senate would have the right to deal with the Senator; and it might go so far as to say—indeed, I undertake to say that it should say—"You cannot be enrolled, nor can you take your seat, nor can you participate in the deliberations of the Senate."

That, however, is wholly a different question, as I view this important matter.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. NEELY. I invite attention to the fact that the statement just made by the Senator from Georgia is explicitly supported by rule II of the Senate, which is as follows:

> The oaths or affirmations required by the Constitution and prescribed by law shall be taken and subscribed by each Senator, in open Senate, before entering upon his duties.

So, manifestly, under the rules of the Senate no Member of this body could enter upon the discharge of his duties, or become a Senator to all important intents and purposes, until he had subscribed to the oath of office required by the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am sure I agree with the statement made by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia. I am also certain that it was appropriate for the First Congress to provide the oath, because that Congress was simply carrying into execution a provision of the Constitution which was not, in the strict sense, self-executing; and, of course, it is appropriate that the oath be administered at the beginning of the session. But, Mr. President, I do not put my argument upon the single circumstance that a person elected to the Senate does not become a Senator in fact, or may not become a Senator in fact, until the oath has been taken. One cannot become a Senator in fact until the Senate is in session, until he has presented himself, until he has taken his seat, and in regular order under rules of the Senate he must have also taken the oath, and until he is free—indeed, until he has assumed the obligation—to participate in the deliberations of the Senate.

What burden or duty rests or can rest upon one merely elected to the Senate even after the beginning of the term of office but who has not in fact entered the Senate and who has not taken the oath, who has not claimed his seat, and who has not placed himself in position to meet as a matter of duty the responsibilities of the senatorial office?

The broad position the majority of the committee takes is that, giving to this clause of the Constitution a liberal, a common-sense, a logical construction, a person does not become a Senator in fact until he enters the Senate, until he takes his place in the body, and until he places himself under obligations to discharge the duties of the office of Senator. In my judgment, that view of it is justified under the Constitution.

Mr. President, what is the reason for this particular clause in the Constitution?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator stated that a person did not become a Senator until he entered the Senate. I take it the Senator means by that the day when his term of office begins to run.

Mr. GEORGE. I am discussing that feature of it, and I have said, as the Senator from Idaho may have understood, that I did not believe it would be seriously contended that a person from the date of his election became a Senator.

What were the reasons which led to the inclusion in the Constitution of clause 3, section 3, of article I? First that clause provides three qualifications: Age, citizenship, and residence or habitancy.

Undoubtedly it was the view of those who framed the Constitution, the view of the Constitutional Convention, that no person should be a Senator who had not for some number of years been a citizen of the United States. After much debate and after several changes the Convention resolved that no person should be a Senator who had not been for 9 years a citizen of the United States.

The Convention rightly distrusted the placing of so great power as carried by the office of Senator in the hands of anyone who had but recently become a citizen of the United States. The fear of domination of foreign powers, particularly the fear of English influence, led to the inclusion of this particular provision in the clause to which I have referred. So it was resolved that no person should be a Senator who had not been for 9 years a citizen of the United States.

What is the reason for this qualification? Is it that he must have been a citizen on the day when he was elected? He could assume no responsibility then. He could do nothing by virtue of his election. He could participate in the making of no law nor could he vote upon any measure. He could formulate or shape no policy. He could not influence the action of the Government at all.

Was it that he must have been a citizen for 9 years at the date of the commencement of his term of office, unless actual as distinguished from potential senatorship was in contemplation? Let us look to the reason for it.

Until the person elected has come to the Senate, has entered the body, has taken his place as a member, he is not in position, nor does he have the power or responsibility to cast a single vote, to register a single official act, which could influence any policy of the Government. So, when the framers of the Constitution said that no person should be a Senator, it meant exactly what it said, that he should not be a Senator in fact unless he had been for 9 years a citizen of the United States.

So, with respect to age, the Convention undoubtedly meant and undoubtedly intended that no immature person should exercise the functions and discharge the duties of the office of Senator, and in determining where immaturity ended and maturity commenced they fixed on the arbitrary age of 30, and provided that no person should be a Senator who was not 30 years of age and who had not been 9 years a citizen of the United States.

Again, on the date of the election of a person, whatever his age, it must be admitted, I think, that he is not, by virtue of election alone, charged with any responsibility as a Senator.

Also, at the date of the commencement of the term the person elected to the Senate, without a further proceeding, assumes no duty as a Senator, certainly acquires no power to influence the course of legislation or policies of government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator what would be the legal effect if a man were elected to the United States Senate at the age of 23?

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will permit, I shall reach that point.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am inquiring solely for information, because the Senator from Georgia has made a study of this question, and I have not. When the Senator answers the question I have already asked, I should like to have him state, if he will, how far below the age limit one can be and how long he can wait before he will be without the provision of the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be very glad to discuss that point. I am trying to discuss now the language of the Constitution under which it is asserted that Mr. Holt is not entitled to take his seat at this time, under the facts as they now exist.

Let me repeat, it cannot be that the Constitution means that no person shall be elected to the Senate who is under 30 years of age, or who at the time of the election has not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, because there would be no reason for that. The person elected, whatever his age and whatever the length of his citizenship, would be in no position to take any action or to discharge any duty which in any wise could affect the affairs of the Nation. Equally I think he could not be in position to take any action or discharge any duty or obligation which would in any wise affect the affairs of the Nation until he had actually become a Senator.

A person elected to the Senate undoubtedly becomes a Senator-elect on the date of the beginning of his term of office. Whatever may be said by way of argument to the effect that he becomes such Senator-elect even from the date of the election, I will not stop to consider, because he certainly is in the position of Senator-elect from the date of the commencement of his term of office. It therefore becomes necessary to notice briefly other provisions of the Constitution.

I read now clause 1 of section 3 of article I:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State—

And since the seventeenth amendment—chosen by the people thereof, for 6 years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

The clause immediately following—that is, clause 2 of section 3, article I—provides that—shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year.

Immediately after they—

By the twentieth amendment to the Constitution it is provided that—

The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Undoubtedly, Mr. President, there are within the meaning of the Constitution senatorial terms. Unquestionably, every man elected to the Senate or appointed to the Senate is elected or appointed to a senatorial term, or to a part thereof. There is nowhere any provision in the Constitution—and, indeed, it cannot be asserted that it is required by the Constitution—that one must be elected before the beginning of the specific term to which he is elected. The records of the Senate will disclose that in case of elections by the legislature before the seventeenth amendment, and in cases of appointment by the Governors of the several States, the Senator has been elected or appointed for a term or a portion of a specific term. There is, therefore, such a thing as terms of Senators.

In the case of Andrew Jackson, who was elected months after the beginning of the term, the very commission which he brought to the Senate contained the language that he was elected for the term which began months before his actual election.

Therefore, Mr. President, it does not seem to the majority of your committee that it can with reason be asserted that a person elected to the Senate becomes an actual Senator within the meaning of clause 3, section 3, article I of the Constitution on the date of the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

There is a distinction and a difference between the Senator-elect from the date of the beginning of his term down to the time when he actually assumes the duties of the office of Senator and after that time. That is necessarily true, Mr. President, because the election of one to public office does not make him a public officer. Under our law he has the option of accepting or rejecting the office, and until he accepts the office he cannot be said to have become the officer in fact, although he may have been elected, and his returns may have been made, and his commission may have been issued.

We are, of course, well aware of the presumption which is raised that one elected to a public office, one who has been a candidate for it, one who has been successful in the election, is presumed to accept the office, if nothing more appears. On that general question, of course, there can hardly arise an issue. That one does not necessarily become a Senator within the meaning of the third clause, section 3, of article I of the Constitution on the date when the term to which he was elected begins, seems certain. He is not then a Senator in fact, and he cannot be made a Senator in fact until the Senate, as the Senate is convened, and until he enters upon the discharge of his duties, or at least assumes the obligation to discharge his duties as a Senator.

Mr. President, in dealing with the power of the Senate to judge of the qualifications of its Members it is, of course, well known that each House of the Congress—or, in this instance, the Senate—is the sole judge of the elections, the returns, and the qualifications of its own Members. It is also known that by the very explicit terms of the Constitution a majority of the Senators must be present before the Senate itself is authorized to do any business.

I shall read that provision of the Constitution, because it seems to have a very important bearing upon a proper construction of clause 3, section 3 of article I:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members.

Mr. President, we are discussing here not qualifications of a candidate for office. Bear in mind, the language of the Constitution is—

No person shall be a Senator.

The only reason that could have been in the minds of those who framed the Constitution was that an immature person, one not yet 30 years of age, could not sit here and make laws and shape policies; that a person not a citizen of the United States could not sit here until he had been a citizen of the United States for 9 years; but if and when he presents himself to this body he possesess the age qualifications, and he meets also the citizenship qualifications, he is entitled on reason, on the application of the rule of common sense, to sit in this body and to assume and discharge the duties and functions of a Senator.

In the case of habitancy the rule is different, because the second sentence of this particular clause says that—

No person shall be a Senator * * * who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The reason is again present when we consider that clause of this particular section. The reason is this: The Constitutional Convention knew very well that all during the period of the Revolution States had been represented, not by inhabitants of those States but by inhabitants of other States. A citizen from Pennsylvania represented the State of Rhode Island. Indeed, Rhode Island was represented by two citizens, inhabitants of other States. So the Constitutional Convention took into consideration that fact, and resolved:

No person shall be a Senator * * * who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

There then existed, as now, the feeling of jealousy on the part of the smaller States against the more powerful and larger States; and it was desired by the Convention and provided by the Constitution that no one should be a Senator who was not when elected an inhabitant of the State for which he was chosen, because a Senator should come from his own State; he should be living within that State; he should be familiar with the problems of that State; he should have an interest in the affairs of that State; he should have a loyalty to that State; hence the command of the Constitution.

Why should it be said in the very language of this article that no person shall be a Senator who is not 30 years of age, and who has not been 9 years a citizen, and then when we pass to the habitancy qualification why should it be specifically declared, "nor shall he be a Senator"—for that is the effect of it, although the conjunction "and" here is used—unless when elected he was an inhabitant of that State for which he was chosen? The language is "when elected." The framers of the Constitution were not concerned about whether a man was 30 years old when he was elected; they were not concerned about whether a man had been 9 years a citizen of the United States when he was elected; but they said he cannot sit as a Senator, he cannot be a Senator, until he reaches 30 years of age, and until he has been 9 years a citizen.

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that if we apply the common-sense rule to this matter and examine the reasons for the three qualifications of clause 3, it must be concluded that a Senator is not, in fact, within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution, a Senator when the beginning of his term arrives or at the beginning of his term of office.

Mr. President, there is another provision of the Constitution which has a rather direct bearing upon the general question which we are discussing. It is provided that no person who holds an office under the United States shall, during his continuance in such office, be a member of either body of the legislative branch. I am not quoting the language exactly, but that is the sense of it. That section of the Constitution has been construed by the Attorney General, it has been construed by the House of Representatives in more than one case, to mean that the person elected to the House cannot take his seat until he shall have divested himself of any other office held by him under the United States.

In one case in which the question arose and was decided by a vote of the House, though by a narrow margin, it is true, the Member-elect was a United States district attorney on the date of his election. He did not resign that office on the date of the commencement of his term of office, but he waited rather until 3 or 4 days before the actual convening of the Congress to which he was elected to divest himself of that office. The question arose whether he was a Member of the House either on the date of his election or on the date of the commencement of his term or only when he appeared, subscribed to the oath, took his seat, and assumed his duties as a Member of the House. It was resolved by the House that he was entitled to retain his seat, although if he was a Representative from the beginning of the term to which he was elected he did continue to hold another office under the United States.

Indeed, Mr. President, the House has definitely gone on record, not only in that case but in subsequent cases, and in a case involving the citizenship clause of the Constitution has construed the identical clause, so far as language is concerned, which fixes the qualifications of Members of the House of Representatives as meaning that the person elected to the Congress must possess the qualifications of age and of citizenship at the time he becomes an actual Member of the legislative body.

In the case of John Young Brown, from Kentucky, I believe it appears that at the date of his election he was not 25 years old, which is the age qualification fixed by clause 2 of article I of the Constitution for membership in the House of Representatives. It also appears that he was not 25 years of age on the date of the commencement of his term. It moreover appears that he was not 25 years of age on the very day Congress itself assembled, because in Jefferson's Manual it is recited that a Member having appeared who was not 25 years of age he was not enrolled, but waited until he had reached the age of 25 and then was permitted to take the oath and become a Member of the House. To all those who are troubled, and to my brethren who take the opposite view of this matter as to the ill consequences that may flow from the seating of a man who, at the beginning of his term of office is not 30 years of age, let me say that the case of John Young Brown has stood in the House of Representatives for more than half the time since the organization of the Congress under the Constitution of the United States. In the Thirty-sixth Congress he appeared, stood aside, and waited until he was 25 years of age, and was then given the privilege of taking the oath; he took the oath and assumed his duties as a Member of the House.

The query is presented, if one who is 29 years old, or 29½ years old, as in this case, may be elected to the Senate and may wait 6 months after the beginning of the term to which he was elected has commenced to run to take his seat, a man who was only 27 years of age or 26 years of age or 25 years of age may do likewise; and it is suggested, by way of argument, that one-third of the Senate might be elected before they had reached the age of 25 or 26, and that even two-thirds of them might be elected at the immature age of 25 or 26; and it is asked what then becomes of government; how can it function? The answer, Mr. President, is in the reaction of the American people to the precedent set by the House of Representatives in the John Young Brown case more than 75 years ago. In that case the House, by its action, did exactly what we are asked to do here today and no more; and yet immature men under 25 years of age have not been elected in sufficient number to prevent the orderly functioning of government. The facts themselves answer the query. The American people are not going to extremes; their judgment may be relied upon, in most instances, except in extraordinary circumstances, in fact, to elect men who are beyond the age of 25 for the House and beyond the age of 30 for the Senate. We have no concern with that; but we have a just concern with a proper interpretation of this provision of the Constitution and a proper application of it to the facts in this case.

It may be said that a Senator may stand aside until he reaches 30 and thereby the State will not have its equal representation in the Senate. It must be borne in mind, Mr. President, that the constitutional provision is that no State, without its consent, may be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate; but whenever any State elects any man who cannot immediately qualify, it must be held to have given its consent that, for the time being and until a qualified person can come from that State to the Senate, the State itself has consented to be denied its equal representation in the Senate.

It may be said that, of course, if one under 30 years of age is sent here under a commission of the people of his State, acting and speaking through the Governor of the State, he cannot take his seat, and that embarrassments will follow. The same follows when any one of us here, whether we be 30 or 40 or 50 or 60 years of age, has received a commission from his State and yet does not elect to come here and qualify. In the one case he cannot qualify and in the other case he does not elect to qualify. Bear in mind we are not now concerned with what the rights and powers of the Senate may be to deal with a Senator who is 30 years of age and who yet does not appear at the beginning of the session of the Senate to which he was elected, or at sometime during it for that matter; nor are we concerned with the possible power and authority of the Senate to deal with a situation where one who was much below the age of 30 had been elected and where he, therefore, could not qualify. What the power of the Senate may be under such circumstances is altogether another matter. I do not think the Senate is without power to act appropriately in the premises.

Mr. President, I had not expected to present this matter at this time at this great length. I have added, I am conscious, little or nothing to the written report which is before all Senators. I am not discussing at this time two very important Senate precedents, but I think it would be fair that I should make reference to them.

I refer to the Gallatin case first because it came first in point of time. Every Member of the Senate knows that Mr. Gallatin was elected to the Senate of the United States from the State of Pennsylvania. Everyone knows that at that time he was not or had not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, nor was he a citizen of the United States for 9 years at the beginning of his term of office, nor had he been a citizen of the United States for a period of 9 years when he came to the Senate, took the oath and assumed the duties of the office. Also he was not yet a citizen of the United States for 9 years when the Senate by adverse action declared that he could not retain or keep his seat in the Senate.

The next case, and the only other direct precedent which has a bearing—and it has a direct bearing, although it deals with the citizenship qualification, but so far as that goes the citizenship and age qualifications stand precisely on the same basis—is that of General Shields, who was elected by the Legislature of the State of Illinois to a seat in the United States Senate. At the time of his election he had not been, as it afterward developed, a citizen of the United States for 9 years. He had not been at the date of the commencement of the term to which he was elected a citizen of the United States for 9 years. He had not been, on the day when he came to the Senate and took the oath of office and assumed the responsibilities of his office, a citizen of the United States for 9 years. He had not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years on the day when the Senate by adverse action excluded him from further participation in the deliberations of the body.

True, in the Shields case, some of the friends of the general suggested and moved the postponement of the consideration of the resolution declaring his election void until the subsequent session, at which time he would have been a citizen of the United States for 9 years. The Senate declined that, and it seems to me properly declined it, and proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

It is true also that General Shields, after he had been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, was returned to this body, having been again elected by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

Mr. President, we must deal candidly with these precedents. In the Gallatin case the resolution of the Senate declared that Mr. Gallatin was not entitled to a seat in the Senate because at the time of his election—that is by fair inference, for I believe the word "election" is not used—he had not been a citizen of the United States for a period of 9 years or for the length of time required by the Constitution. From subsequent debate, as well as from a consideration of the resolution itself and of the matters which took place concurrently with it, it is clear that the Senate then assumed and then resolved that Mr. Gallatin was not entitled to a seat, that his election was void—because that was the language of the resolution—because he had not been a citizen for 9 years at the time of his election.

When the Shields case arose, identically the same resolution was offered, and upon the motion of Senator John C. Calhoun, from the State of South Carolina, it was amended, by attaching to the end of the resolution the language, to wit, "At the date of the commencement of his term of office." In the Gallatin case the Senate resolved the election void because Gallatin had not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, if I correctly interpret the resolution. In the Shields case the Senate resolved that the election of General Shields was void because he had not been a citizen of the United States for a period of 9 years at the time of the commencement of the term of office for which he had been elected.

Mr. President, I wish to invite attention to another point. The Shields case expressly modifies and materially changes the precedent set in the Gallatin case because undoubtedly the precedent there was that the election was void because Gallatin had not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years on the date of his election. There was an express modification and change. The Senate, as it was constituted when General Shields appeared here, did not believe the resolution was in point of fact and of law correct, so it added to it the modification which I have just quoted.

It, of course, may be argued that the Shields case is a precedent directly in point in the instant case. The majority of your committee concede it. The majority of your committee concede that the resolution adopted in the Gallatin case and the resolution adopted in the Shields case cannot be harmonized with the resolution which we have offered in this case. But we point out that the instant case stands upon a different set of facts and that, under the admitted facts in both the Gallatin and the Shields cases, the same result would have followed, applying what we believe in this case to be the correct and proper rule, to wit, their exclusion from the Senate.

It is true that under the resolutions in the Shields and Gallatin cases, as I have already said, the finding of the Senate was that the election itself was void and in that respect the resolution which we recommend and present here is not identical. In the instant case, however, Rush D. Holt, while not 30 years of age at the time of the election, and not 30 years of age at the time of the commencement of the term to which he was elected, is nevertheless 30 years of age at this moment, when he stands at the bar of the Senate; and there is not in any circumstance which impelled the clause of the Constitution now invoked for his exclusion the remotest reason why he should now be prevented from becoming an actual Member of the Senate of the United States and actually entering upon the discharge of his duties as a Senator.

Mr. President, it no doubt will be argued, and with great plausibility, that Mr. Holt was more than a Senator-elect at the beginning of the term of office to which he was elected. I do not know how I can make the position of the majority of the committee plainer. Senators are elected to terms of office in this body; but, though they are elected, they may never accept. They may decline. They may pass away, by death or otherwise, before they actually become Members of the Senate. Can it be doubted that a Senate is never a Senate until a majority of those elected to it not only have passed the date of the commencement of the terms to which they were elected, but until they have assembled and are ready to do business? They cannot become a Senate, they cannot discharge the functions of a Senate, until a quorum is present; and the quorum itself is prescribed by the language of the Constitution.

So, Mr. President, the rule which the majority of your committee respectfully submits is one that it believes to be consonant with the real reasons underlying every qualification stated in clause 3 of section 3 of article I of the Constitution; and, moreover, it seems to us to be the commonsense application of the several qualifications fixed by the Constitution for one who seeks admission into this body as a Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be very glad to answer any questions I can answer.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not wish to split hairs, but I am still concerned. Suppose Mr. Holt had been born in 1910 instead of 1905 and should present himself 5 years from today. Could he be seated?

I assume the answer of the Senator to the question will be that each case must be determined on its individual merits. I think that was the argument of the Senator, that it is difficult to specify directly at the moment what should be done. But I should like the able Senator's answer to the question.

What would be the attitude of the Senator from Georgia if a Senator today were presenting himself because on this day he became 30 years of age, but he was elected 5 years ago? What would be his attitude in a case like that?

Mr. GEORGE. So far as the constitutional provision is concerned the answer must be, it seems to me, that he would be entitled to take the oath and assume his duties. I do not say that the Senate would have been without power in the meantime to have dealt with a situation like that. In my judgment the Senate would have had power to proceed adversely to the interest or any future assertion of interest by a candidate who had withheld himself so long from the Senate, either voluntarily or because he could not have then qualified.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If that be true, the Senate could, of course, take action and exclude the gentleman; but under the theory of this case it ought not to do so if the majority of the committee are right, because they say, the State having elected him, knowing his age, that he is entitled to his seat whenever he appears. If that is sound reasoning in a case where 6 months are involved, it is equally sound in a case involving 5 years.

So while the Senate could, under the Senator's theory, have excluded the Senator-elect before the expiration of 5 years, yet if the contention of the majority of the committee is correct they ought not to do it, because they ought to wait the 5½ years for him to present himself, since he has been elected by the people of the State.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me say, in order to avoid any confusion upon that issue in principle, that it would make no difference when he appeared if he was then able to meet the constitutional qualifications.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true.

Mr. GEORGE. But let me also say to the Senator from Texas and to the Senator from New York that cases of that kind are not likely to arise; and let me cite to them the instance of John Young Brown, who more than 75 years ago was permitted to do in the House what the Senator-elect from the State of West Virginia is now seeking to do, and the House has been troubled by no such embarrassing situations as have been imagined.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, he could not have waited 5 years in the House, because the term would have expired.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, that is true.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	King	Pittman
Ashurst	Copeland	La Follette	Radcliffe
Austin	Costigan	Lewis	Reynolds
Bachman	Davis	Logan	Robinson
Bailey	Dieterich	Lonergan	Russell
Bankhead	Donahey	Long	Schall
Barkley	Duffy	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Bilbo	Fletcher	McCarran	Sheppard
Black	Frazier	McGill	Shipstead
Bone	George	McKellar	Smith
Borah	Gerry	McNary	Steiwer
Brown	Gibson	Maloney	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulow	Gore	Minton	Trammell
Burke	Guffey	Moore	Truman
Byrd	Hale	Murphy	Tydings
Byrnes	Harrison	Murray	Vandenberg
Capper	Hastings	Neely	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hatch	Norris	Wagner
Chavez	Hayden	Nye	Walsh
Clark	Johnson	O'Mahoney	Wheeler
Connally	Keyes	Overton	White

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the absence of the Senators named by me on previous roll calls, and assign the same reasons for their absence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it is an unwelcome and a thankless task which I set myself this afternoon. I do the job that I am trying to do here now in the presentation of this matter solely because I believe that in this life of ours, and in the particular activity in which we engage in this Chamber, it is every man's responsibility, every man's duty, to do the thing which he thinks he ought to do, no matter whether it be popular, no matter whether something else may have been decreed by somebody else, and no matter what may be the vote that may be cast upon the one side or the other. And so today, while my predilections are all in favor of the course I do not pursue, and while I should have liked to reach a conclusion other than that which I have reached, after very mature and very careful consideration and study, I present from the standpoint of one who has sought the truth, and thinks he has found it, this particular case.

Mr. President, there are in reality no issues of fact here. The facts are conceded. I strip from the case all those intangible matters which have been presented by the briefs. I eliminate from discussion any of those questions which have arisen because of the oath or the representations or the statements which have been made by the applicant here. I do not stress in the slightest degree any other thing in this particular contest than the law as it stands and the facts that are absolutely conceded.

The gentleman from West Virginia is here asking to be sworn, sworn 5½ months after the beginning of his term. The gentlemen who sponsor him, including the very distinguished Senator who just presented the majority views, have conceded heretofore, and I presume they will concede again, that they would not have seated him between the 3d day of January 1935 and the 19th day of June 1935.

Mr. President, I appeal to those who have a rudimentary knowledge of the law that if that be so, and if Mr. Holt should not have been seated between the 3d day of January 1935 and the 19th day of June 1935, he cannot, with due regard to the Constitution and the laws and precedents, be seated now; and that is what I shall endeavor to demonstrate.

I am sorry that any demonstration should have to come from me. First, I am a believer in peoples. I believe that when the people have reached a choice concerning any candidate for office, that choice ought to be compelling and binding upon us. But, sir, when I am under an oath to determine what shall be my course and my duty in respect to a matter of this sort, I cannot permit any of those views which I may have concerning the popular will, and the intensity of my desire to enforce it, to interfere with the conclusion which I feel bound to reach under the law and the facts.

Two ways we may approach this case. We may approach it, first, as a case of first impression, without regard to any precedents which have occurred in the past. We may approach it from the reason of the thing, the provisions of the Constitution which are applicable to the particular matter; and then, if we reach a conclusion, we may pass to the precedents which have been established in days gone by and see whether or not they uphold that which our reason has told us is the appropriate thing to do under the circumstances.

Senators recall, of course, the provision of the Constitution:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

That is the plain provision of the Constitution. When the term of office of the gentleman from West Virginia began, on January 3, 1935, he saw fit, very appropriately, to stand aside and not present himself here to be sworn in as a Senator of the United States. Why did he do that, and why have the admissions been made in this case which have been made? Because on January 3, 1935, he was ineligible to become a Senator of the United States of America. No man denies that. There is not a lawyer in this body who will gainsay it. At that time, at the beginning of his term, he was ineligible to become a Senator of the United States.

The query presents itself, therefore, whether or not by lapse of time his ineligibility to become a Senator of the United States will be removed; and it is just that which I say the lapse of time cannot accomplish.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will yield for a query, but I do not want to yield for an argument.

Mr. CLARK. I will not make an argument. I simply desire to ask the Senator whether there was any ineligibility of any sort on January 3 except the question of time?

Mr. JOHNSON. There was ineligibility on account of the lack of qualifications under the Constitution. Of course, it was a question of time. The Senator is referring to the 30 years, I presume. Of course, that represents time, but it represents a qualification under the Constitution, and, representing a qualification under the Constitution, it must have been possessed, in the view I take of this matter, at the time when the term of office began to run.

There may be differences of opinion upon that point. We will proceed and see whether we can reconcile them. We will ascertain what has been the viewpoint in the past of men who have sat in the United States Senate and who have passed upon questions of this sort, and, if we cannot reconcile our views, if the view of the majority of the Senate shall be the view as presented by the Senator from Georgia, then, of course, the determination of this body will be in favor of the gentleman from West Virginia.

If we are bound, as some of us think, by the letter of the law, by the spirit of the law, by the determination that on January 3, 1935, there was but one Senator from West Virginia here, and that there was a vacancy in the office of Senator from that State, then there is nothing we can do, under our oaths, but to vote that way.

Mr. President, the original first paragraph of section 3 was as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for 6 years, and each Senator shall have 1 vote.

The seventeenth amendment, it will be remembered, changed the phraseology of that portion of section 3 by providing for popular election, but the seventeenth amendment retained the other provisions—that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected for 6 years.

It would serve no useful purpose for me to attempt to detail the reasons for that constitutional provision. All Senators who have read at all concerning the proceedings that were had by the Constitutional Convention long, long ago will remember with what jealousy the weaker States observed the stronger ones, and how finally the weaker States came together, formed a little coterie, and determined that there should be no Constitution unless they were put upon equality with their more populous and their more influential brethren. Ultimately the very convention itself was threatened with dissolution because of the activities of the representatives of smaller States, and finally, upon the appeal of Franklin himself, it was determined that all States would be put upon an equality, that all should have two Senators, and it was determined, as well, that the term of office of Senator should be for 6 years.

I pass on, merely suggesting the fact that the State of West Virginia in the last five and a half months has not really had two Senators here. The State of West Virginia has had one Senator qualified for a period of 6 years, and when Mr. Holt is seated here will have a second Senator for a period of five and a half years. I say that in passing merely, not as determinative of the case, not, indeed, as indicating that the decision ought to be one way or another, but I say it simply that Senators may have the entire picture before them, and that they may understand all of that picture instead of merely one small and limited part thereof.

In this contest we have presented, therefore, the provisions of the Constitution in relation to qualifications perfectly plain. We have the provisions of the Constitution in relation to term of office and number of Senators undoubted and unquestioned. We have, too, the ability to determine, from an examination of the various sections, what the purpose of the framers of the Constitution was, and, determining that purpose, our duty is to carry it out by the votes we cast.

The qualifications of a Senator are set forth in the Constitution:

First. No person shall be a Senator who has not been 9 years a citizen of the United States.

Second. No person shall be a Senator who has not attained to the age of 30 years.

Third. No person shall be a Senator who when elected is not an inhabitant of the State for which he shall be chosen.

It is admitted by the sponsors for Mr. Holt that if he could stay here five and a half months awaiting the time when he could be sworn in as a Senator, he could wait five and a half years. Of course, the answer of the Senator from Georgia to that is that it is an impossible instance. He may be entirely right, such a thing might never occur; but occasionally by an extravagant illustration we can better understand and better construe language which may be used.

Five and a half years he may stand aside, not a Senator of the United States, awaiting merely a qualification which will be given to him by the lapse of time. If he can stand aside 5½ years on the question of his age, he can stand aside 5 years and 11 months upon the question of his citizenship, and it is just that which the precedents in the Senate determined, as we shall hereafter see.

Do Senators believe that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that one could stand aside awaiting qualification and eligibility for 5½ years? Of course not. No man ought to claim that, because, of course, such a thought never was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution. Do Senators think it was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution that one could stand aside 5 years and 11 months upon the qualification of citizenship? Of course not. None would assert that. All that can be asserted is that those are extravagant illustrations; but they are the logical result of carrying to its conclusion the position which is taken by those who are here in behalf of the applicant today, and the logical result of what is claimed in his behalf.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does the Senator think that anything in the resolution reported by the committee would establish the right of a Senator to withhold himself for an unreasonable time without taking the oath of office?

Mr. JOHNSON. There is nothing in the resolution which says that at all.

Mr. BULKLEY. The resolution simply presumes to decide——

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator knows the resolution just as I do. The resolution does not say that a Senator-elect may stand aside for five and a half years. That is a rhetorical question of my friend from Ohio; and while I welcome that rhetorical question, it serves no real purpose. I readily concede, of course, that the resolution does not do that which has just been suggested, and it does not do what the Senator is inquiring about. However, no one here said that it did. I say, and I say it advisedly, that at the hearing on this matter in the committee the query was made: "If you can stand aside for five and a half months, can you not stand aside for five and a half years?" and the answer was, "Yes."

Mr. BULKLEY. The answer was that if anybody did stand aside that long, and presented himself at a time when he was qualified, then he ought to be sworn and be permitted to go ahead and do his duty; but we did not undertake to decide that a man could withhold himself for an unreasonable length of time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly not; but that is the logical result of the position which the Senator takes, and that position was distinctly taken by the applicant himself before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There is not any question on that score, sir. The Senator may not have been present during the hearing, or the meeting which was held, but that was exactly the position taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BULKLEY. It certainly was taken to the extent I have just stated, that if anyone should stand aside that long without any objection, and then present himself, he would then be eligible to be seated; but there was no suggestion made, so far as I ever heard, that we were justifying an unreasonable delay in the presentation of credentials.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not recall that the particular language, "We are justifying an unreasonable delay," was used; but I do recall that it was asserted, and I state with positiveness, that if this applicant could stand aside for five and a half months, he could stand aside for five and a half years. So there is no difference between us, I think, in regard to the fact that the Senate might act some day, somewhere, at some place. That, perhaps, is well conceded; but logically I insist that if one can stand aside five and a half months, waiting for time to cure his ineligibility and furnish him with the requisite qualifications, logically, he could stand aside for five and a half years; and I do not think there is any escape from that reasoning at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think it was conceded before the committee that if the committee had promptly acted upon the memorials which had been presented—when I say "promptly", I mean at any time before the date when Mr. Holt would attain the age of 30 years—and had rendered a decision, the committee would have been compelled to render a decision adverse to the right of Mr. Holt to take a seat in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that was stated, sir.

During the election last year in West Virginia, be it said to the credit of the applicant here, he made no concealment of the fact that he was under the requisite age. There is not any doubt in my mind, from the testimony which was adduced, that the people of West Virginia understood that Mr. Holt was under 30 years of age during the primary and during the election, and that his birthday was mentioned again and again during the campaign. I think there is no question on that score. However, I also think that he acted upon an erroneous assumption during the campaign that because Henry Clay had sat in this body when he was under age, therefore a precedent had been established under which he might reasonably act—forgetting that nobody knew of Clay's age, and forgetting that during that period Clay's right to a seat in the United States Senate was never challenged and the question never arose at all.

What is being sought here is, by a short cut, to amend the Constitution of the United States. We are amending the Constitution of the United States here by saying, not that a man shall be 30 years of age when he becomes a Member of the United States Senate but that if he may become, at any time during the period for which he is elected, 30 years of age, then he will possess the requisite qualifications, and then he may be seated.

I do not object in the slightest degree to amending the Constitution of the United States, but I desire to amend it in the mode which is prescribed, not by legislative or senatorial dictum.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. As I understand the position of the Senator from California, it is that Mr. Holt should have had the requisite age qualifications at the beginning of his term.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MINTON. And the Senator says he does not favor short cuts in the amendment of the Constitution; but if that position were adopted by the Senate, would not the Constitution then read?—

No one shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years at the time his term begins.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think not. I disagree with the Senator there. That is the disagreement which is in this case. I confess the question is not without opportunity for legitimate argument on both sides; but I insist that the qualifications of the applicant for a seat in the Senate must be those which present him as eligible at the time his term commences.

Let us now look for a moment or two at the only real precedents there are in the Senate. I eliminate the two or three which may be in the House, readily conceding that they may be of another character from those which the Senate presents. I eliminate the long list of cases which may be found upon the one side or upon the other in the digests and in our reports. I turn, so far as precedents are concerned, to the Senate itself. The precedents in the Senate are so clear and convincing that if we shall determine by precedent—which, of course, no good lawyer will do when the precedent is against him, and every bad lawyer will endeavor to do when it is for him—if we shall determine this case by precedent, the precedents of the United States Senate are so conclusive that no one can deny them or gainsay them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course the Constitution means the same thing to both Houses. It cannot mean one thing to one House and another thing to the other House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I will yield for a question, not for an argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yields contingently; he yields for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand the situation which exists here, I will say to my friend from Kentucky. I am presenting to him what I am presenting from the highest motives which can actuate a man, perfectly conscious of the set-up which there is here; and for that reason I do not want to get into long, perhaps even acrimonious, arguments with anyone. I recognize every man's right to decide this case as he sees fit. I question no one's motive; but I do not desire to enter into long arguments during the course of what I am saying.

Mr. BARKLEY. The statement I made was preparatory to a question which I desired to propound. If the Constitution means the same thing or should mean the same thing to both Houses, are we bound by a precedent set in the Senate merely because we are Members of the Senate, which may have been a bad precedent, in consideration of the fact that almost the universal rule in the other House on the same question has been the other way?

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me say to the Senator that I have never been bound by a bad precedent in my life, whether it was created by a court or by any other branch of Government, and I never shall be. But, of course, when a precedent meets with my views, and convinces my reason, then I reach the conclusion at once, without difficulty, that the precedent is an excellent one and ought to be followed; and I am sorry to say that most of us have the peculiar and singular quirk which enables us to look at precedents in just that fashion.

However, seriously speaking, I may say to the Senator that one of these precedents is of such character, the men who participated in it were of such high renown, the greatest there are in American history, they present their case in such fashion that aside from a matter of precedent at all, their arguments are convincing; and it is utterly impossible, in my opinion, lightly to brush by what they do and what they say.

The first of the precedents to which I call attention is that growing out of the case of Albert Gallatin which has been referred to here today. His name has been written large in American history. Senators know what his genesis was; they know the high offices he filled in the Government of this country, and the great patriotic services he rendered unto the Nation. He came into the United States Senate elected from the State of Pennsylvania. In February 1793 he was thus elected. The question of his citizenship arose. It was insisted that he had not been a citizen of the United States for the time required by the Constitution. He had been a citizen for a period of about 8 years. Because he had not been a citizen for the time prescribed by the Constitution, Mr. Gallatin's election was declared by the Senate to be void.

The most interesting feature of this precedent is that some of the men who sat in the United States Senate at the time when the case of Albert Gallatin was decided had sat in the constitutional convention; some of the men who rendered the decision against Gallatin because he had been a citizen for but 8 years and a fraction instead of 9 years had written into the very Constitution some of its important provisions. So at the very inception of the Constitution of the United States, at the very time it became the organic law of this land, the question that is before us today was construed and decided by men who wrote the Constitution, who struggled for it, and who had it adopted by our country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Unquestionably the precedent which the Senator from California has just cited, namely, that of the Gallatin case, is to the effect that a Senator must possess the requisite qualifications at the time he takes his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON. The qualification of citizenship.

Mr. ROBINSON. At the time he takes his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, that decision did not so hold, if the Senator will excuse me; the decision in the other case held that. There is a question as to the Gallatin case, but I think the consensus of opinion is that the Gallatin case related back to the election, while the Shields case related to——

Mr. ROBINSON. But if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not care to discuss the matter with the Senator. I am correct in my facts, and if the Senator will turn to the gentlemen behind him who sat upon the committee he will so find.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, if the Senator does not care to discuss it, I will refrain from attempting to do so in his time, but I think the election was held void by the resolution of the Senate, and that would seem to indicate that a Senator must possess the qualifications required at the time of his election.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly, that is what I said to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it the Senator's position that a Senator must be of the required age at the time of his election or at the time of taking his seat?

Mr. JOHNSON. At the time the Senator's term commences. That is my position in this case.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the Senator has just said that the Gallatin case is to the effect that a Senator must possess the qualifications at the time of his election.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I will ask the Senator why does he insist that the Gallatin case is an unanswerable precedent when he himself admits that the Gallatin case is based on the principle that a Senator must possess the qualifications at the time of his election, and the Senator concedes that a Senator must possess them at the time of——

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sorry the Senator from Arkansas, I fear, is not so familiar with this question as are some of the Members who have been passing upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from California cares to indulge in that assumption, I will say that I went into this subject very fully at the time the case first arose here at the beginning of the session.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, if the Senator is familiar with it, very well; I will withdraw my statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not again interrupt the Senator, in view of the spirit which he displays.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is not any "spirit" I am displaying. Of course, the Gallatin case is a precedent on the question of the possession of the qualification in relation to citizenship. It does not make any difference whether the Gallatin case decided that qualification must be possessed at the time of the election or at the time when the term commenced. The gist of the decision is that qualification of a 9-year period of citizenship must be possessed by the particular applicant or the particular Member sought to be seated. That was the point of the decision; and upon that point is where it is conclusive in this case.

Now, let me recall to the Senator that neither at the election or at the time of the decision did Mr. Gallatin possess the 9-year citizenship qualification required by the Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was the very point I started to make when the Senator indicated he did not desire to discuss the matter. Gallatin was elected and took his seat on December 2, 1793; on February 23, 1794, the Senate adopted a resolution declaring his election void. Mr. Gallatin took his seat before he possessed the 9 years' citizenship qualification.

Mr. JOHNSON. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON. He would not have been a citizen for 9 years until October 1794. So, as I said a few moments ago, the doctrine of the Gallatin case is that a Senator must possess the qualification of citizenship at the time he takes his seat or at the time of the election.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator does not contend that the theory that he must possess the qualification at the time of the election is correct, as I understand him; he admits that, so far as the Gallatin case is a precedent requiring 9 years' residence at the time of the election, it is a bad precedent and is not to be followed.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, Mr. President, I do not admit anything of the sort. I will make that entirely plain; I admit nothing of the kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will modify my statement by saying that the Senator should admit it, in view of the statement he made a while ago.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should admit it because the Senator from Arkansas has delivered his dictum upon it, but I do not admit it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; I made my statement based upon what I understood the argument to be. I ask the Senator now to say whether he contends that the 9-year qualification of residence must be possessed at the time of the election?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have told the Senator once, no; that is not my view.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I repeat——

Mr. JOHNSON. Wait a moment, while I answer the Senator. But when in the Gallatin case neither at the time of election nor at the time he took his seat did he possess the requisite qualification, the precedent, of course, is clear.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, the precedent, insofar as the requirement of 9 years' residence at the time of election is concerned, is, as I said a few moments ago, a bad precedent, in the opinion of the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, my friend from Arkansas is like that distinguished lady who always had the last word; we will let it pass at that. I am not attempting to utilize this particular occasion for saying that everything that may have occurred in the Gallatin case is applicable here. I am saying that, on the reasoning in the Gallatin case, upon the facts there presented, it is a precedent, and a controlling one, in this case, and if all the facts will be taken into consideration by the Senate, if all the circumstances will be considered by the Senate, if the time of the election and the time when he took his seat, and the time when the decision was made, will all be considered, the fact that it is a precedent in this case will not be denied, I am sure, by the Senator from Arkansas or any other Senator upon this floor.

Now, let us turn to the second precedent. That was the case of General Shields. I respectfully submit that this precedent must be overturned by the United States Senate in order that the applicant here may be seated. There is no other logical conclusion to which I can come than that if we seat Mr. HOLT upon the argument that has been presented here, we do it in the very teeth of one of the most momentous decisions that was ever made by the Senate upon a question of eligibility or a question of admission to this body.

Shields was elected by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, as will be recalled, for the term of 6 years, beginning March 3, 1849. On March 6 the oath of office was administered to him and his credentials were referred to a special committee of the Senate. It appeared from the committee's report that General Shields was naturalized on the 21st day of October 1840, and therefore the full term of citizenship required by the Constitution he lacked by about 7 months. The committee of the Senate presented a resolution, as follows:

That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States.

The action finally taken by the Senate—taken upon the motion of John C. Calhoun—in reality, was this:

Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

In that addition, "at the commencement of the term for which he was elected", it may be is the difference between the Gallatin case and the Shields case. In the former it seems to have been determined that the crucial date would be the date of election. In the latter it was determined positively and unequivocally that the crucial date was the date of the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

In the Shields case we have everything that is presented here, only, of course, in different fashion and by different motions. In the Shields case all the Members of the Senate were friendly, as I trust all the Members of the Senate here are friendly to the gentleman who comes from West Virginia and knocks at our doors. All of them treated him with utmost consideration, and most of them expressed a desire to seat him if it were possible.

The brilliance of the galaxy of men who participated in the discussion, I warrant you, sir, has never been exceeded in the history of the United States. Not only did they discuss the question from a constitutional standpoint, not only did they discuss it in its every phase, but they discussed the question of whether or not they should postpone the case for 7 months in order to enable General Shields by the lapse of time to gain the qualification which he lacked when the case came before the United States Senate. One of the most illuminating debates which have occurred is that which then ensued upon the question of postponement in order to make one who was ineligible at the time finally eligible by the lapse of time.

I shall not attempt to read all of that debate. Some of it, though, I want the Senate to hear. Now and then I know the gentlemen who sit above us, now and then I know some who sit here in the Senate, are accustomed to say, "Oh, that is old stuff." Now and then I know, when we quote from the great of the past, there are those who scoff a little and talk a little that their greatness might not have been so great after all. But I cannot read the debate in which Mr. Webster, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Seward, and others participated without feeling that at some time, some place, in this great country of ours we had men of ability, we had men of courage, we had men who, whatever might be their predilections in a particular case, were willing to stand up and be counted for the course which they deemed to be right. They set us an example. "Old stuff" it is, and "old men" are these, but they set us an example which sometimes, somehow, somewhere, some American may follow.

Let me proceed just a moment now with this debate. Mr. Butler replied to Mr. Foote, when he asked a postponement of the case:

My judgment on the subject is that if General Shields had not taken his seat at all, perhaps at that time he might have claimed it; * * *.

I do not say that I have any opinion upon the subject one way or the other, as to whether under the circumstances he will then be entitled to take his seat; but I am fully of opinion that there is no absolute necessity for eligibility to exist at the time of the election—

Taking exception to what was assumed to have been decided in the Gallatin case—

I merely wish to support the constitutional view of the question. If I thought he could not constitutionally take his seat, and that it must be considered vacant, I should be bound to vote for the resolution reported by the committee; * * *.

That there may be no mistake about the position I take in this case, let me say that perhaps I am just one man with one vote who takes this position. I take the position that on the 3d day of January 1935 there was no Senator here from the State of West Virginia to answer to the call, and that when it was then conceded that the gentleman who had been elected did not possess the requisite qualifications, then there was a vacancy in the office, and no dictum of the United States Senate can subsequently fill that vacancy.

Mr. Berrien, of Georgia, said:

* * * Sir, I cannot entertain a doubt myself of the correctness of the report of the committee. I cannot conceive that the Legislature of Illinois exercises the power conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States, when that legislature elects one who is ineligible; and I cannot reconcile to myself the idea that, since by the Constitution the term of office is limited to 6 years, that term of office may be made to commence at a time posterior to the time when the individual is elected. * * * It will be, therefore, impracticable, in my judgment, for the Legislature of Illinois, when they meet again, to proceed to nullify their own act by electing a Senator again to fill the same office. Until the election be declared void, there is nothing upon which they can act. * * *

Then Mr. Webster came into the debate and, referring to General Shields, said:

* * * He must prove that he has been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, in my judgment, on the 4th day of March. * * *

Why, it appears to me to be plain as a turnpike road. The State of Illinois has sent a gentlemen here as her Senator, upon whose qualifications it has been our duty to pass at large; and when it is stated, as a compliment and mark of respect to the honorable Senator, that no remonstrance has come here from the State of Illinois, I agree to it all; but, sir, if every citizen of Illinois were here today in his own proper person, and desired the confirmation of the Senator's claim, since the matter has been brought to our notice, and since it is before us, we must decide it according to the Constitution, and our oaths. * * * Sir, our duty to the State of Illinois is to decide this question in a reasonable time, that she may have her own reasonable time to fill the vacancy. She has the right to expect it at our hands. I hope we shall follow it out at once. We should remember the responsible part we are performing in the discharge of high functions. If we are of opinion that the gentleman sent here is not eligible, we should say so, and signify that to the State that sent him here. I shall therefore vote against postponement. * * *

Mr. Hale said:

* * * But until such an avowal shall be made by General Shields or somebody for him, that he does expect to alter the state of the facts, it is the duty of the Senate to vote upon it. Permit me to say, sir, that I respect that provision (sec. 3, art. I) more than anyone in it, for when I looked at the Constitution and the history of the country for the past few years, I found very few provisions of the Constitution over which the party in power has not trampled rough-shod. This, sir, is a green spot on which the heel of party has not trod, and I desire to preserve it. I appeal to the Senate, too, to guard and preserve it.

Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina, said:

I hold that nothing is more certain than that if General Shields is not now a Senator of the United States he never can become such by postponement. The Constitution is explicit in requiring that no person shall be a Senator unless he has been 9 years a citizen of the United States. If, then, he is not a Senator now there is a vacancy, for Illinois would have but one vote here, and that vacancy must be filled according to law. That he is not a Senator is clear, because he cannot perform one duty belonging to the senatorial office unless he has been naturalized 9 years previous to the commencement of his senatorial term. Thinking thus, I deem it due to the State of Illinois that the question should be now settled, unless General Shields shall allege that he has evidence which will in all probability be satisfactory to the Senate that the term of 9 years had expired before the 4th of March. If such an allegation shall be made by General Shields, it will be the duty of the Senate to postpone it, but not otherwise. * * *

And now, sir—

And this was the point that was made by Mr. Calhoun upon the crucial time of the disqualification—

And now, sir, I come to a point of some little importance, and it is that the question here involved should be clearly settled, not only for the present, but for all future time. My opinion is that the resolution is not entirely correct. It would seem to conclude that all kinds of elections are void unless 9 years shall have expired on the day of election. I think that is not according to the Constitution. My opinion is, that if the 9 years are consummated previous to the 4th day of March the election is good and is not void. I propose, therefore, to add to the resolution the following words: "At the commencement of the term for which he was elected."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire whether, in the opinion of the Senator, there is any difference between that case and the Gallatin case, except that in the Gallatin case, he not being qualified on the day of election or on the day the term began, it was not of any great importance to determine whether the disqualification was on the day of election or on the day the term began; but when the Senate came to the Shields case, and gave more careful consideration to it, the Members of the Senate at that time, as was just read by the Senator, desired to be more careful about the matter, and to set a precedent for all time, and they added those additional words. That, it seems to me, is the only difference between the decisions in the two cases.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir. Excuse me; I thought the Senator wished to ask a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. If it will not interrupt the course of his argument, I desire to say that the Senator has quoted two very eminent authorities in support of the theory that the qualification must be possessed at the beginning of the term. The Senator, I assume, is aware that other almost equally if not equally eminent authorities, consisting of renowned Members of the Senate at that time, in the Shields case asserted with great forcefulness the doctrine that the true test of eligibility was its application at the time the Senator presented himself for qualification, or for the performance of his duties.

The Senator from California has quoted Senators Webster and Calhoun. In the same debate, in what seems to me to be unanswerable argument, Senator Stephen A. Douglas, Senator Turney, and Senator Butler, among others, took the position that the test applied neither at the time of the election nor at the beginning of the term, but only when the Senator presented himself for qualification, or when he sought to begin the performance of the duties of the office. They held that he could be a Senator if, when he offered to perform the duties of a Senator, he was eligible under the Constitution. The statements, I assume, are well known to the Senator from California who, without doubt, has studied this case, and I felt it appropriate to call attention to the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Douglas' argument the Senator has stated with correctness, I think. He made a very eloquent speech in behalf of his colleague. He was making a glorious fight for Shields.

Mr. ROBINSON. And so did Senators Butler and Turney.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I think the Senator is mistaken about Butler, but he may not be.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I have the speech here.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right. I am going to read it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. My recollection, which I refreshed some time last winter upon this subject, is in accordance with that of the Senator from Arkansas. I am quite certain, as he is certain, that Senator Douglas urged that the qualifications of General Shields should be determined as of the time when he appeared to take his oath. But, Mr. President, I think the fact that so great an advocate as Senator Douglas raised that issue at that time and in that way is itself the most convincing kind of support for the position taken by the Senator from California.

This is true because Senator Douglas presented his suggestion with the greatest possible force, and then the Senate, with full understanding of both sides of the question, deliberately rejected his theory. So, whatever else may be said of the excellence of his presentation, the fact is that the action taken, after full debate, and most thorough understanding of the matter, was against his position, and in support of the position maintained here by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. On the particular occasion, Mr. Butler said, if the Senator will follow me in his notes there:

> I maintained yesterday, and still maintain, that although General Shields was not eligible at the time of his election, yet if he could have taken his seat on the 4th day of March with his qualications complete, his previous ineligibility would not vitiate his election. But, inasmuch as it is represented that he could not at the time of taking his seat show that his qualifications were complete, I must be permitted to say that I am clearly of opinion that it cannot be maintained that he ever had valid title to his seat at all. The question resolves itself to this: Did his election confer upon him a valid title to the seat on the 4th of March? If it did not, it is not a title at all. You may qualify it by calling the election voidable, or void, if you please. He had prima-facie evidence of title to the seat in the credentials which were presented. But the moment it was ascertained that the title conferred upon him no right at all to take his seat here on the 4th of March, you cannot say that any title had been conferred upon him at all. * * *
> But it is represented here that General Shields, having no title to his seat, must go back for reelection or appointment by the Governor and that it is the duty of this body to throw no obstacle in the way, but to act in such a manner as to render this practicable. Sir, we cannot construe the Constitution of the United States for the accommodation of individuals. That is out of the question. My own inclinations are in favor of the sitting Member. I concur in the opinion that it is due to the State of Illinois that this question should be settled. I know it has been stated that General Shields has offered to resign. But if there is nothing which he can resign, the act would be a nullity. To determine this, we must go back to the distinct inquiry as to whether the election conveyed a valid title at the time when he was called upon to discharge the duties of the office. If the election never has been valid, I presume it will be admitted that the Governor cannot fill the vacancy, and the sooner the facts are ascertained the better, in order to enable the Governor of Illinois to take measures to have the State represented by Senators upon this floor.

Again, in the course of the general discussion, Mr. Webster said:

> * * * I hold, most unquestionably, that the election was void, because the person upon whom the election fell was not competent to discharge the functions of the office that are intended to be conferred upon him; that is to say, to be a Senator from the 3d of March 1849 for 6 years. Now, if he could not be a Senator from the 3d of March for 6 years, then he was not eligible for the senatorial term, and it might just as well be said that he might be elected when he had been a citizen 6 years, and await the lapse of 3 years before commencing his period of service, as it may be said that he may be elected and await the lapse of 9 months. The proposition is so clear that I think a little reflection will satisfy every gentleman on the subject.

What closer reasoning to the case pending before us could we have than that which was given by Webster, concerning whom I need not indulge in panegyrics; but what greater precedent could be established in any case than this case of General Shields presents unto us and unto the Senate?

Of course, there have been, doubtless, other precedents in the other House. That is all right. Where do we find the better reasoning? Where do we find the precedent that is ours here in the United States Senate? And if those precedents answer the query which was put in the preliminary of this discussion, they should be all-controlling and all-compelling.

Mr. President, if we decide this case upon the plain meaning of the Constitution, it seems to me there can be no doubt of the decision. If we decide this case upon the senatorial precedents that have gone before, equally so, I think, there can be no doubt of the decision.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield. I am about to yield the floor, if the Senator would prefer it.

Mr. BULKLEY. No; I would rather ask the Senator two or three questions, if he is willing to have me do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Go ahead; I am glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does the Senator contend that the committee resolution comes to a conclusion which is inconsistent with the conclusion arrived at in the Gallatin and Shields cases, holding those Senators ineligible to retain their seats?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so.

Mr. BULKLEY. The committee will wish to differ from that view.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, naturally we differ upon it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, we concede that we are undertaking to overrule the language of the resolutions adopted in those cases; but we do not concede that we are undertaking to say that the result disqualifying those Members from sitting was wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON. The majority of the committee may be able, in adopting what the Senator says, to say the result of the cases is not different, but disagree with the particular printed resolution which was adopted.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is our position.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, the Senator remembers, in "Hudibras", how—

> He could distinguish, and divide
> A hair 'twixt south and southwest side.

I will not concede that the position stated by the Senator is reasonable.

Mr. BULKLEY. I shall discuss that question later, but I should like to ask the Senator from California whether he believes that an elected candidate becomes a Senator at the date of the beginning of the term.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not making that contention, sir. Was that question asked in view of the contention which has been made by my brethren upon the committee? Let them speak for themselves on that subject.

Mr. BULKLEY. I wished to make sure that the Senator did not approve that contention.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have presented here certain observations of my own. Those I stand upon. I have not signed the minority views presented by my brethren upon the committee, and so I am making no such contention as the Senator suggests.

Mr. BULKLEY. Just one more question. Does the Senator believe that the resolution finally adopted in the Shields case does in fact set a precedent for all time and is correct under all circumstances?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am not going to say anything with which under all circumstances, under every conceivable condition, and every circumstance of which one can conceive, one might not at some time disagree. But I say that the Shields case is a precedent. It is a precedent much more nearly like the instant case and much more nearly in point than the ordinary precedent we find in legal cases. The Shields case is a precedent which ought to be controlling and compelling here if we follow precedent. But beyond that, the Shields case, on the question debated, and in the debate itself, is most persuasive, and it seems to me, in regard to the pending case is conclusive.

Mr. BULKLEY. That answers my question.

Mr. MINTON and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Indiana, who rose first.

Mr. MINTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether he does not believe that in the Shields case the resolution which was adopted by the Senate decided more than was actually before the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that may be so; that one might reasonably say it did.

Mr. MINTON. The resolution offered by the majority report in the pending case would not overrule the Shields case as a precedent but simply would refuse to follow what we might call the dictum in that case.

Mr. JOHNSON. It seems to me we cannot distinguish between the reasoning of the case and what might ultimately have been decided, and the reasoning in the Shields case is such that it affords a precedent which, as lawyers love to say, is on all fours with the case at bar.

Mr. MINTON. What I was going to point out was that the Senate decided something more in the Shields case than was actually before it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is speaking of that because of the fact that Shields resigned?

Mr. MINTON. No. As I understand, the only question before the Senate at that time was whether Shields was then entitled to his seat, and the Senate decided not only that question but that he had to have the qualifications on the day his term began, and they thus decided something that was not before the Senate, and to that extent it was dictum and would be so considered in any law case.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not say the Senator is not right in that regard—I think not—but it does not alter the fact of the precedent.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will yield if the Senator desires to ask a question.

Mr. LONG. I hope it will be a question. I will undertake to ask it as a question.

I understand it to be pretty generally argued that one must be eligible to take his seat when his term begins. Of course, that means that if he is ineligible by reason of age, or for other causes, he should not be permitted to take his seat.

In that connection I call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that the courts have held that one holding another office, such as Governor of a State, cannot become a Senator, that he is ineligible because his office is incompatible with the office of United States Senator. Now I come to the point——

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me say to the Senator, if he is going to ask me a question, ask the question; otherwise I will not yield. If the Senator does not want to ask a question, if he wants to be funny, let him go ahead and be funny in his own time, not in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California decline to yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. Let us have no mistake about that. I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, has the Senator yielded the floor?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. LONG. The Senator declines to yield to a question. I did not want to be funny.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the Senator go ahead if he has a question. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. I was just going to ask the Senator this question: Would not the case of the elder Robert La Follette, and of Senator Dieterich, and of myself——

Mr. JOHNSON. And of myself.

Mr. LONG. And of the Senator, and many other Senators who were Governors, who failed to come here and take their oath of office when their terms began, and who, therefore, enforced upon themselves ineligibility—would not that have disqualified them from later on——

Mr. JOHNSON. I answer: "No." That is the answer, and it is conclusive; No!

Mr. President, just a word in conclusion. I said in beginning that very reluctantly I had come to the conclusion I have reached in this case. I say that in closing. Personally, I said in beginning, personally, I say at the close, I would rather have reached another conclusion and I would have preferred that I might have rendered another verdict here. But I say again in closing, as I said in beginning, I am under an oath, other Senators are under an oath, and I take it that they perform their duty under their oaths as the Lord gives them the light to see their duty, and I perform mine in just that fashion. It is not a matter of how many or how few are with us. It is a matter of no consequence that there shall be a determination rendered one way or another, but we do the best that we can, and act accordingly to the lights that are ours. I am acting that way today, and I do not give a rap whether there is one vote or two votes or three votes, whether there are four votes or none the way I vote. I am voting upon this case reluctantly, but voting because I have taken my oath as a United States Senator, and the day that I violate that oath as I see it, may I be taken from this floor never to return.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate on this subject. If there are any Senators who wish to speak in support of the majority report, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to take a few minutes, if the Senator is going to speak against the committee report. I desire to put just one observation into the RECORD.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I take it, at least agreed with the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], or the Senator from California has agreed with the Senator from Arkansas, that the disability of age is not one which applies at the time of the election. That has been admitted. Therefore we have only one other thing to consider: Does the disability apply, if there is ineligibility, at the time the term begins? That would be the only other matter to discuss.

Having conceded that the disability at the time of the election does not make one ineligible, the only point left is this: If one is ineligible at the time the term begins, does that bar him from later on becoming eligible?

It has been held in a decision rendered by Justice Van Devanter, now on the United States Supreme Court, and it has been held by many other courts that one holding the office of Governor of a State is ineligbile to be a Senator. He must divest himself of the office of Governor before he can become a Member of the United States Senate.

Therefore, if I were today given the right to become a Senator, and my term began, and I none the less continued as Governor, I would be ineligible to become a Member of the United States Senate.

Which is the worse in eligibility? Is it worse to have this technical ineligibility because of a few days of age, or is it worse to be ineligible by reason of the fact that one persists in doing the overt act of continuing as Governor when he knows that makes him ineligible to be a United States Senator? If that is to be the criterion to govern in the pending case, then the Senate has seated a dozen men who never should have been allowed to take their oaths of office as United States Senators.

The elder Robert M. La Follette waited 1 year before he surrendered the office of Governor of Wisconsin and made himself eligible to become a United States Senator.

Mr. Hoke Smith, of Georgia, waited, I think, from 8 to 10 months before he surrendered the office of Governor to become a Member of the United States Senate.

I waited a period of 1 year and 3 months after I was elected to this body before I gave up the office of Governor to become a Member of the United States Senate.

A Senator from New Jersey waited 1 year and 1 day before he gave up the office of Governor to become a Member of the United States Senate.

There was a gentleman by the name of Dietrich, a former Member of this body, not the present Senator from Illinois, but a Senator from Nebraska, who was Governor of Nebraska, I believe, or if he was not Governor, he held some other office, and he was elected to the United States Senate. He took a fee for appearing before a public board, and he was indicted and tried in a United States court, and, I think, convicted, on the ground that, having been elected to the Senate and his term having begun, he was a United States Senator, and, therefore, could not accept a fee for appearing before a public board.

It was proven that after this man had finally taken the oath of office he went back and drew his salary for all those days from the time when he would have been entitled to take the oath of office.

What did the court say? Judge Van Devanter, now on the Supreme Court of the United States, decided in that case that a man did not become in any respect a Member of the United States Senate for any purpose whatever until he had taken the oath of office as a United States Senator, and that no disability, no disqualification, and no other thing of any kind or character applied to that man until he presented himself at the bar to take the oath of office as a Member of the United States Senate.

To such an extent was that recognized to be the law that Congress amended the statute so as to provide that a Member-elect of the United States Senate could not accept a fee for appearing before a public board, so that those who had been elected would be in the same category after their election, and until they took the oath of office in open session of the United States Senate, with those who were Members.

In the case now before us what is the contention? The only contention left, in view of what the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] admits and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] admits, is that if there is any disability of any kind or character which exists on the very day that a man presents himself here he is forever barred. Even the slightest kind of a natural technical disability would bar him. If that be true, then the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself and perhaps other Members who serve in this body have come to the Senate and have been permitted to take the oath of office after having removed a disability which disqualified us all the way from 19 days to a year and 4 months after our terms began.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. And nothing but the expiration of time removed that disability.

Mr. LONG. That is all. I am very sorry my friend from California thought I meant to make his case personal. If he thought that, I will say that I had no such intention. I believe my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who was Governor of the State of Arkansas, might have come here a few days late. He announced that he did. A number of us, Mr. President, have come here to this body a few months—and in my case a year and 3 months—after our terms began. To argue that the lack of 5 months of requisite age is such a terrific disability that one would be disqualified is so contrary to what we have done in these other cases that I do not understand how it can have much application.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. In none of the cases where the disqualification was alleged to have attached because the Senator-elect was holding another office incompatible with that of United States Senator was the question, so far as I recall, ever raised in the United States Senate to the effect that he must have divested himself of the other office at the beginning of the term for which he was elected Senator. Of course, there is no logic in distinguishing between one requirement for eligibility and another.

Mr. LONG. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. If a Senator in order to be eligible must have the qualifications at the time of the beginning of his term, and if it is necessary in order to be eligible that he shall not hold another office incompatible with that of a Senator, then it follows irresistibly that the Senator was disqualified if at the beginning of his term he held another office incompatible with that of Senator of the United States.

Mr. LONG. That is just what I have been trying to state. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has stated it clearly.

The question in this case is not the question which actually arose in the Shields case or in the Gallatin case, for the reason that in both those cases at the time the Senators presented themselves and began to attempt to perform the duties of their office they were ineligible by reason of the fact that they did not possess 9 years' citizenship. It is, therefore, clear that, as stated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], the Senate decided something more than it was required to decide in order to reach a conclusion in the Shields case and in the Gallatin case. Those cases, therefore, are not precedents in a case where the issue is whether the Senator at the time he presents himself and attempts to perform the duties of his office is rendered ineligible by the fact that at some previous time he had not reached the age of 30 years.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In those cases, if I understand, not only was the Senator involved ineligible at the beginning of his term, but he was ineligible at the time he presented himself to begin his term.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Yes; in both cases.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Not only is that true, but he was ineligible at the time of the election, at the time of the beginning of the term, at the time he presented himself and was sworn, and ineligible on the very day when the Senate passed the resolution in both cases.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. He had never acquired eligibility as to citizenship, and, therefore, it was a different case from the one now at the bar of the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to say a word further along the line of what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said. The only time the Senate takes cognizance of a disability is when a man comes here to become a Member.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the only time we can do it.

Mr. LONG. That is the only time we can do it. We have no business to go back and see if a year and a half before he was not a justice of the peace, or whether 4 months before he was not old enough. The only time the Senate is concerned with a man's qualifications is when he steps to the desk of the Vice President to take the oath of office to become a Member of this body. We have no jurisdiction beyond that point. The only jurisdiction which is vested in any body is in the sovereign State which the man represents.

One more point. If the sovereign State which the man represents thinks it is a better thing to have him wait a few months before he comes here and takes his seat, as was thought in the case of the Senator from Arkansas, in the case of the Senator from California, in the case of the Senator from Wisconsin, in the case of the Senator from New Jersey, in the case of the Senator from Nebraska, in the case of the Senator from Louisiana, and in the case of the Senator from Georgia, if the people of those sovereign States think that they would rather have him wait a few days in order that they can get, perhaps, what they think to be better talent, that is the right of those States.

The State is the only body which has any right to judge these qualifications prior to the man coming here to take his oath of office; and when a man presents himself here, having satisfied the sovereign State from which he comes, then if he comes here and has the prescribed qualifications, we have nothing except to ask, "Does this man standing here now possess the qualifications to entitle him to take the oath of office?" It is not for us to ask, "Did he possess them last year?" or "Did he possess them last month?" or "Did he possess them last week?" or "Did he possess them yesterday?" but, "Does he now possess them?"

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Prior to the recent amendment of the Constitution, theoretically the term of every Member of the Congress began on the 4th of March, but, unless the President called an extraordinary session of Congress, the Member did not take the oath until the first Monday in December. If some man had been elected to either House who was not of the required age on the 4th of March, but could not take the oath of office until the following December, and had become eligible by reason of age in the meantime, does anyone suppose that either branch of Congress would have denied him the right to take his oath of office if he were old enough at the time he presented himself to take the oath, which would have been at the beginning of the first term after his election?

Mr. LONG. I do not believe anyone would have urged that that man was not eligible. For the same reason no one can urge that the Senator-elect from the State of West Virginia is not eligible.

Let me make only one further observation, because I have spoken longer than I had expected to speak. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] read from the Constitution wherein it said that every State has the right to two Members in the United States Senate. However, the Senator from California forgets that that article of the Constitution did not apply in all of these other cases to such an extent, or under such an interpretation so it could be said that any day on which the Senate did not have the two representatives here from the State the Constitution was being violated. I think the Senator from California overlooked that point.

There is only one other point raised on the floor of the Senate which I wish to answer. Some ask, "How long can a man wait? Can he wait 5½ years?" That is a matter which I think I can answer; here is the rule which Congress has always followed; here is the rule which the United States always has followed, and here is the rule that I think is a safe rule: If one presents himself within the first congressional term to which he has been elected, he has never been denied the right to take the oath of office. I do not know that the Congress would extend that time—I doubt it—but when one presents himself to the Seventy-fourth Congress, to which he has been elected, 1 day late, 2 days late, 1 year late, he will nonetheless be allowed to serve in the Congress to which he is elected.

It might be that the State—and I say that States are reasonable—might say that inasmuch as this man has not appeared in the Seventy-fourth Congress, it will proceed to elect someone else. That is the right and the function of the State. It might be that the Senate itself would say that the rule did not apply when one failed to appear at the Congress to which he was elected. However, in this particular case, and in all the other cases which I have cited, when the man elected presented himself to the Congress to which he was elected there has never been any question about his right to take his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] in the nature of a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if there is any other Senator who desires to address the Senate in behalf of the majority report, I shall be glad to give way.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I may desire to submit some remarks after the Senator from Texas shall have concluded. I do not understand that there is any order of procedure here which requires one to speak prior to the remarks of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. GEORGE. Not at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I did not mean to suggest that there was any order. I merely indicated that I should be glad to give way to any other Senator if he desired to speak now. I am ready to proceed.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a short statement?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. As a member of the committee who fully agrees with the majority report, I think I should make a brief statement. After careful study I believe that we cannot differentiate from the decision in the Shields case. I think it is true that the Senate in its resolution went further than it needed to go in that particular case, but judging from the debate which was had at that time, and the decision which the Senate reached, I think the decision in the Shields case cannot be distinguished.

I for one am perfectly willing and glad to overrule the decision in the Shields case, based entirely upon the very logical statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] in presenting the majority opinion.

So while I am very happy to vote for the seating of the Senator-elect from West Virginia, in my opinion, we are overruling the precedent established by the Shields case; and I think we ought to be glad to do so, because, although there may be a close question as to which side we should take, in a case where a sovereign State by such a splendid majority has registered its choice, I think everything should be resolved in favor of the choice of that State; but I for one, as a member of the committee, regard such action now as overruling the Shields case.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I wish to make sure that the Senator does not understand that the rule now suggested by the committee would have brought a different result in the Shields case so far as seating the Member is concerned.

Mr. DUFFY. That perhaps is so, but I think we cannot read the debate that took place at the time the Shields case was before the Senate, granting that the resolution went further than it needed to go, without coming to the conclusion that if this case had been pending it would have been held that the Senator from West Virginia was not entitled to his seat.

Mr. BULKLEY. The point is that is not what they were voting on at the time. They were voting on a different state of facts.

Mr. DUFFY. I understand that, but I state that I cannot come to any other conclusion.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. When it is considered that the debate did go into the question of the postponement in order that General Shields might be qualified later on, is it not true that the Shields case is exactly in point?

Mr. DUFFY. That is my opinion, after a fair discussion as to whether it would not be advisable for Senator Shields to step aside and to wait for the lapse of time when he would be eligible, I concede that it is a precedent, but I, for one, am very happy to overrule that precedent, because I think the side of logic and the side of justice demand that course.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. May I just suggest that all the debate occurred after General Shields had taken the oath, so that even if he had stepped aside at that time it would have presented a different state of facts from that which is now before us. Of course, I agree with the Senator that we do presume to overrule the resolution which was adopted in the Shields case, and I want to go with the Senator on that, but I do not think that we are overruling the result in the Shields case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I would not address the Senate except for the fact that, not having joined in either one of the minority views and yet having voted in the committee against seating Mr. HOLT, I feel it somewhat incumbent upon me to set forth my views.

As a member of the committee, I could not agree to the majority views, and I shall vote for the resolution presented by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] as a substitute, holding that Mr. HOLT is not entitled to take the oath of office. I desire to say that I have reached this conclusion with a great deal of reluctance. My every impulse, of course, is to vote for the seating of those who come to the Senate with credentials from their States evidencing that they have been elected by the people, and in this particular case I have the utmost regard for Mr. HOLT whose credentials are now under discussion.

As a Member of the majority side of the Chamber, I regret that I have to part company with my colleagues of the majority; but, Mr. President, in election cases it has always been my purpose to pass upon the legal questions without any passion and without any of those extraneous considerations which frequently operate upon our minds with regard to legislative questions.

I hope that I shall not be tedious, but I shall naturally have to repeat some of the things so well said by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in his very able and informing address.

When the makers of the Constitution set up this form of government they provided for a Senate and a House of Representatives. I read now from the seventeenth amendment.

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for 6 years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

Mr. President, I cite that particular section of the Constitution for the reason that it is important to bear in mind when the people are voting for Senators that they are electing them for a definite fixed period, beginning at a certain time and expiring at a certain time. The Constitution requires that when the people elect a Senator they shall elect him for 6 years, not for 5½ years or 3 years or 2 years, unless in case of an unexpired term.

The twentieth amendment, which is the so-called "lame duck" amendment, further makes clear what was in the minds of the makers of the Constitution and those who amended the Constitution. It provides as follows:

> The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

That amendment had been adopted and was in effect when Mr. HOLT was elected by the people of West Virginia. At that time the people of West Virginia and Mr. HOLT knew that the term for which he was elected began on the third day of January 1935. I quote now again from amendment XX:

> The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

That constitutional provision was in effect when Mr. HOLT was elected, and so he knew and the people of West Virginia knew that the term for which he was elected began on the 3d day of January 1935 and the Congress itself met on that very day.

What is the other provision in regard to qualifications? As has already been quoted, section 3 of article I reads:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

I wish in my remarks to stress the question of the election itself. Under the contention of some of us supporting the minority view we hold that the election of an ineligible candidate is a void election. If the election is void and no one was elected the title to the office cannot be acquired by the expiration of time, because that which is void is just as if it had never occurred. The precedents that have been cited here, I am sure, are all well known now to Senators.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Does the Senator have some authority to the effect that the ineligibility of a candidate makes the election void?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think so.

Mr. MINTON. Is the Senator going to cite some authorities to that effect?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not any available court decisions here, but I have the precedents by which the Senate so held. The Senator is familiar, of course, with them. Let me ask the Senator what happens at an election when a man is elected who is absolutely ineligible and who never can become eligible? In that case is not his election void? What happens to it?

Mr. MINTON. I think it may be voidable, but it is certainly not void. The election is valid in every respect; but it might be voided by some action taken subsequent to the election.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then it would become void.

Mr. MINTON. Oh, yes; it is voidable.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I say that is true when it appears that a candidate was ineligible in fact?

Mr. MINTON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it is determined that a candidate was ineligible in fact, then the election was void from the start, was it not, under the statement of the Senator from Georgia? When it is void it is void from the beginning?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think it is void from the start. It is voidable as any other act may be voidable.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose a man was elected who the Constitution said was absolutely incapable of ever holding the office?

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose they elected one who was ineligible, nevertheless the election was not void.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; they might have elected other officers, but his election is void; the election of that man is bound to be void.

Mr. GEORGE. I take a different view. That man was ineligible—that is all—to hold the office to which he was elected.

Mr. CONNALLY. We are just quibbling over words evidently. Let us see what would happen. Senators contend that a man who is absolutely constitutionally ineligible and who can never become eligible may be elected because, they say, his election is legal. Then why not give him the office? It seems to me it is absurdity itself.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I think the question of election lies in one jurisdiction and the question of determining eligibility in another.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true, too, but the powers who elect must respect the power of the Federal Government or the Congress to see that the election powers observe the rules of eligibility.

Let us see what the precedents are, not what I say, not what I think, but what the precedents say. In the Gallatin case and in the Shields case are found precedents, not by the House of Representatives, not by some court, but by the Senate of the United States, this identical body. What did the Senate hold?

It was held in the case of Albert Gallatin, who had not been 9 years a citizen of the United States at the time of his election and who had not been 9 years a citizen of the United States at the beginning of his term, that his election was void. Here is the resolution the Senate adopted. I shall not repeat the facts, because there is no dispute about the facts. What did the Senate do? After a number of postponements—

Friday, February 28, 1794.

This is a precedent which has been here a long while.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the 22d instant, on the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub, and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States,

On the question to agree to the motion, as follows:

Resolved, That Albert Gallatin, returned to this House as a Member for the State of Pennsylvania, is duly qualified for, and elected to, a seat in the Senate of the United States.

That resolution was defeated, there being 12 yeas and 14 nays. They then had the following proceedings:

On motion that it should be,

Resolved, That the election of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States.

A motion was made to divide the question at the word "void"; and on motion to agree to the first paragraph of the motion so divided, it passed in the affirmative, there being 14 yeas and 12 nays. So the Senate in that case passed directly upon the question of whether the election was void or not. On a division of the question, the Senate said that his election was void because at the time of his election he had not been 9 years a citizen of the United States. As has already been pointed out, he was not 9 years a citizen of the United States either at the time of election or at the beginning of his term, so it is not an authority as to which date shall control.

In the later case of General Shields the resolution was amended and it was there determined that General Shields' election was void because he was not 9 years a citizen of the United States at the beginning of his term.

When do we expect one elected to office to begin his term? Shall it be at the beginning of the term which the Constitution fixes and for which the people elected the candidate, or shall it be some other time? It seems to me very clear what the men who sat in Philadelphia and were writing the Constitution meant—and that is what we have to determine. What did they mean when they said a man must be 30 years old to be a Senator? Did they mean that part of the Senators might be 30 years old and part of them 29 years old and some of them might come here next year and some the year after that? The makers of the Constitution, we all know in our hearts, meant that the Senate should be composed of men 30 years of age, capable of discharging the duties of United States Senator the first day of their term.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator's argument has suggested this question to my mind: What would happen if we should now elect an alien to the Presidency? Would that be a valid election or not?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly not. It would be absolutely void, and the Constitution so provides.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. May I say that the Constitution not only provides for that situation, but the Constitution declares that anyone who is not a natural-born citizen of the United States is ineligible for the office of President. There is quite a difference between eligibility and the question we are here discussing now. In other words, the clause of the Constitution, which is here involved, simply says that "no person shall be a Senator." The provision of the Constitution which deals with the Presidency in express language declares him to be ineligible—that is, incapable of being chosen.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. The Constitution also requires that a person in order to be eligible for President shall have resided in the United States 14 years prior to the election. Suppose he is a natural-born citizen and has returned from abroad and has lived here 11 years and then should be elected. The point is, could he then live out the 3 years and qualify for the remaining year? It raises an interesting question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be very glad to discuss these questions, if the Senator desires, after we get a little further along on the senatorial matter, because, frankly, I am not as much interested in the Presidential term as I am in the particular question now before us.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Referring to the section of the Constitution which the Senator read, which reads—

No person shall be a Senator who has not been for 9 years a citizen of the United States—

Did the committee consider that if a man was in excess of 30 years of age and qualified in all other respects, but would not be a citizen of the United States until the 19th of June 1935, which was yesterday, that in that case the prohibition of the Constitution would be cured by the passage of time, as the age prohibition has been cured?

Mr. CONNALLY. The report of the committee states just what we did, but I will say to the Senator that I am of the opinion that it could not cure it; that age and alienage are both on the same level because in the Constitution they are both contained in the same clause, but when it comes to habitancy it is put in another clause which says, "shall not when elected be an inhabitant of the State."

Mr. TYDINGS. It is the contention of the Senator from Texas, as I understand, that if we can cure the defect in age by the passage of time until June 19, 1935, we could likewise, and would have to, in order to be consistent, cure the defect in citizenship of the United States likewise by the passage of time to June 19, 1935, if that were the point at issue rather than the question of age. Is that correct?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask, in the time of the Senator from Texas, if the Senator from Georgia agrees that the same philosophy which would cure a defect in age would likewise cure a defect in citizenship?

Mr. GEORGE. Entirely; and I rose for that purpose. In the case of Ellenbogen, who was elected to the Seventy-second Congress from Pennsylvania, exactly that point was raised and exactly that situation was passed upon, because Mr. ELLENBOGEN, who was born in Austria, had not been a citizen of the United States 7 years when he was elected to the Seventy-second Congress. He had not been a citizen for 7 years when the term of office to which he was elected commenced. He passed by the first session of the Congress, and at the second session appeared, when he had been a citizen more than 7 years, and was admitted. Not only was he admitted but during the first session of the Congress objection was raised upon the ground that on the date of his election and on the date of the commencement of his term and at the first session of the Congress he had not been a citizen of the United States for 7 years.

The question was distinctly raised, and was passed upon by Elections Committee No. 2 of the House, and he was permitted to retain his seat in the House.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. If I may answer that——

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to ask only one question, which I think will bring a "yes" or "no" answer.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand the Senator from Georgia, however, the defect, if it related to inhabitancy of the State, could not be corrected by the passage of time, because the words "when elected" are used preceding that clause.

Mr. GEORGE. There is an express requirement in that case.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Georgia cites a case in the House—the Ellenbogen case. That really is not any precedent in the Senate, for the simple reason that each House is the judge of the elections and qualifications of its own Members; so that a House precedent could not have in the Senate the dignity or the prestige that a senatorial precedent has at all. It is our peculiar function to pass on these questions as to Senators. We are a continuing body; and there are other considerations, probably, which operate to the decision of those questions.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Constitution, of course, applies equally to both Houses.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, yes; sometimes.

Mr. ROBINSON. There can be no distinction in principle or in theory of law between a constitutional provision as applied to the House of Representatives and as applied to the Senate of the United States. The words are the same, and therefore logically the application should be the same. For that reason, I think the case of John Young Brown in the House of Representatives is an exact precedent in this case; and, for other reasons which have already been discussed here in part, I do not think either the Shields case or the Gallatin case is a precedent for this case.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am somewhat astonished to hear the Senator from Arkansas say that he does not regard the Shields case or the Gallatin case a precedent for this case.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will tell the Senator in just a few words why I do not regard it as a precedent.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right.

Mr. ROBINSON. In the Shields case, at the time the Senator-elect took the oath of office and attempted to perform his duties he had not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years. In this case, when the Senator-elect from West Virginia proposes to take the oath of office and to begin the performance of his duties, he is 30 years of age. The distinction is so clear that I am astonished that so great a lawyer as the Senator from Texas should not see it without its having to be impressed upon him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield, but I should like to answer the Senator from Arkansas. I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, if the Senator will yield, if the Senator-elect from West Virginia had presented himself here in January, or at any other time prior to his arrival at the age of 30 years, we should have had a parallel case with the Shields case.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Because he would not have been eligible.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is entirely true; and in the Shields case, one question upon which the debate hinged was whether, after Shields had qualified and after he had assumed to be a Senator and perform the functions of his office, the Senate could postpone the resolution until the time when he had acquired the age of eligibility. That question was discussed at great length by some of the Senators, who insisted that even after Shields had presented himself, and after he had assumed to perform the duties of his office and to be a Senator, they might still postpone the determination of the question of his eligibility until after he had in fact become eligible.

I do not think that is sound doctrine. It seems to me the true rule is, giving to the words of the Constitution their natural effect—namely:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years—

Giving to those words their natural and logical effect, when a Senator-elect attempts to perform the functions of his office, when he offers to qualify, if he possesses the age required by the Constitution, he is eligible, because he is 30 years of age when he assumes to be a Senator. In other words, the eligibility attaches to the service, and not to the election or to the term.

That is the position I take.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I should like to answer the two questions which have been asked.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] observed that if Mr. HOLT had come here last January and presented his credentials the Senate would have rejected him. Is that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no way to assume that it would, but I say——

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator have voted that way?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say frankly that I should have voted to reject him.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; that is the point.

Mr. BARKLEY. And I think, if I may express my own opinion, that the Senate would have done so; but the point I made was that if Mr. HOLT had presented himself at any time prior to his arrival at the age of 30 years we should have had a parallel case with the Shields case.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. But, as he did not, the Senate can pass on the eligibility of any man only when he presents himself for admission.

Mr. CONNALLY. Here is the attitude we would be in: According to the Senator from Kentucky, the Senate would have had to reject him if he had come here in January. If he had presented his credentials then, the Senate would have rejected him, and thereby would have created a vacancy in the office of United States Senator. What right would we have had to do that if the people of West Virginia, under this broad doctrine, had the right to elect anybody they pleased to elect?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield right there?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. With the permission of the Senator from Texas, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question.

If we had rejected Mr. HOLT before he became 30 years old, and he had applied later when he had become 30 years old, could we then have seated him?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is not a question which we are called upon to pass on. Very likely we would not have seated him, because in the meantime, if the Senate had rejected him, probably the Governor of West Virginia would have appointed somebody to fill the vacancy, and that question would not have arisen. That is only the expression of a hasty opinion. I have not looked into that feature of the matter; but if the Senate took such action as to create a vacancy in the Senate, I doubt whether it could later revive the senatorship by any action it might take.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, the issue would have arisen, because if the Governor had appointed someone, Mr. Holt then would have appeared here and would have said, "No; you cannot seat him. I am the legally elected Senator from West Virginia", and we should have had to face that issue.

Mr. President and Senators, I cannot conceive of the Senate ousting or refusing to seat a man, thereby creating a vacancy in the representation from that State, and then that that vacancy could be filled, not by a new election, not by appointment of the Governor, but simply by the lapse of time.

Senators have said a great deal about "be a Senator"—"be a Senator." How do men get to be Senators? They do not just grow. They have to be elected. They have to be elected for definite terms. They can be elected only from the particular class of individuals that the Constitution says are eligible; and if the electing power does not select that character of individual, the election is void.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. According to the reasoning of those who advocate the seating of Mr. HOLT, they could not declare that the seat was vacant as a permanent matter. If their argument is sound, they could only declare that at that time Mr. HOLT had not arrived at the requisite age, and therefore he could not take the oath of office. They could not declare the office vacant, if their reasoning is sound, because now, at this late date, they say he can qualify; and obviously it is necessary to take one horn or the other of the dilemma.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me answer the Senator from Arkansas and then I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana. It has been so long since the Senator from Arkansas raised the question that I have almost forgotten it.

The Senator from Arkansas expressed great amazement that the Senator from Texas should cite the Shields case on the issue as to whether——

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; the Senator——

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will wait a minute——

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not express amazement that the Senator should cite the Shields case, because everybody is citing it. My amazement was that the Senator did not make a distinction between the Shields case and the Holt case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly. That is what I was trying to say, but the Senator would not let me.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. CONNALLY. What I desire to say to the Senator from Arkansas is that the Shields case does go into the matters on which he says it is not authority. Let us see about that. There were several motions on that subject. In the Shields case Senator Foote, of Mississippi, rose in the Senate and said that he was anxious to vote to seat General Shields, but that General Shields not having been at that time for 9 years a citizen he could not do it; but he said: "I shall favor postponing this issue until next December, by which time General Shields will have been a citizen 9 years, if by so doing General Shields can become entitled to the seat." He offered a motion to that effect, and there was so much dissent, so much opposition, that he withdrew it.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the point is that Shields had not taken his seat at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. He was trying to take it.

Mr. ROBINSON. He was offering to take the seat.

Mr. CONNALLY. The same as in the case of Mr. HOLT.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the question was whether, after he had presented himself and his disqualification had appeared, the matter could be postponed until he might acquire the qualification. Plainly, as a matter of law, I think the decision in that particular was correct. The question of eligibility arises at the time the Senator presents himself to assume the duties of his office. If he is not eligible then, he cannot assume the duties of his office. If he waits until he does become eligible, then he is entitled to serve as a Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator from Arkansas a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Had Mr. HOLT come here in January, and had the Senate refused to seat him, what would have been his status?

Mr. ROBINSON. He would have been out.

Mr. CONNALLY. He could not come back now and claim the seat?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to hear the Senator admit that, because it destroys his case.

Mr. ROBINSON. After he had presented himself for service and had been found ineligible by the Senate, of course, he could not acquire eligibility.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say this: You cannot stick your head in the sand——

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not trying to do that, the Senator knows.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not referring to the Senator; I am trying to use an illustration in an argument. I do not see why the Senator wants to be so peppery this afternoon.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas, if he desires to have me yield.

What does the Senator from Arkansas say? He challenges the legal ability of the rest of us——

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; I have not done that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know whether the Senator is trying to be witty or offensive.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, I am not trying to be either.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not challenged the intelligence of anyone. I have differed from the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have certainly no disposition to treat this matter flippantly at all. I am trying to be serious. This is the situation in which the Senator from Arkansas by his argument puts this case. He says that if Mr. HOLT had appeared here in January and presented these credentials the Senate would have rejected him and he would have been through.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In just a moment. He was the same age then that he is now. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no! The Senator has made another amazing mistake. The Senator was not 30 years old then, and if he had insisted on taking his oath then, he could not have qualified; but he is 30 years old now, and he is entitled to take the oath. The Senator has not only forgotten his law, he has forgotten his arithmetic. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to admonish the occupants of the galleries that there must be no demonstrations of approval or disapproval. It is a violation of the rules of the Senate, and no such expressions will be tolerated. They interrupt the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, everyone knew that the Senator from Texas did not mean literally what he said when he stated Mr. HOLT was the same age then that he is now. What I mean is, on the issue of age his status was the same in January that it is now, if age is the determining factor. What I am trying to say is that if in January he was not entitled to his seat, and if the Senate would have ousted him, he would have been out, according to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yet nothing has ocurred since then——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to answer the question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. CONNALLY. Nothing has happened since then; he has continued to grow older each day.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say to the Senator that the argument he is advancing is entirely fallacious. The certificate of election which Mr. HOLT held was only an evidence of title. The title to the office was in nubibus.

Mr. CONNALLY. Where? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. In the clouds. If he had presented that title here and it had vested in him in January, when he was ineligible to receive it, then his right to hold the office would have depended on the title which he had when it was vested in him; but he did not present it then. He did not present it until he was eligible to have the title vested in him.

So clearly he is entitled to receive the office at this time, and that is the distinction between this and the other cases which have been cited here. That is the reason why the Senator from Arkansas is absolutely right when he says that if he had presented the credentials in January, when they could not have vested title in him because he was ineligible, he would have been out. But now he is 30 years of age, and he presents the credentials, and when he presents the credentials the title vests, and he is never a Senator until the title does vest, and when he asks that it vest in him, he is eligible to receive the title.

If the Senator can answer that or overturn that suggestion, he will overturn the great body of the law that has been in existence and which constitutes the jurisprudence of the United States on nearly all questions similar to this. It is a question of when the title vests, when it ripens.

When the credentials are tendered here there is a color of title, as it were. He holds the office, but under a mere color of title. Now the question is, Is he eligible to receive the title when he asks that it be vested in him? I have stated the reasons which have led me to support the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to answer this question.

Mr. HASTINGS. I merely call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact, which I assume he already knows, that the credentials were presented on January 3, and that Mr. HOLT went on the pay roll under a statute enacted by the Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. The title did not vest. He was not sworn. The title cannot vest until he takes the oath of office; then the title vests. The question is whether or not he is eligible when the title vests in him.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator was talking about the credentials.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is talking about the color of title.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Delaware for his suggestion. In answer to the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from Kentucky holds, then, that a Senator is never a Senator until Congress meets and he takes the oath.

Mr. LOGAN. Absolutely; that is correct. I do not suppose any Senator would dispute that proposition.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thought I might state something to which the Senator would agree.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Texas agree that no man is a Senator until he is sworn in?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I do not agree to that fully.

Mr. McKELLAR. Could he perform any of the duties?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly he could.

Mr. McKELLAR. Could he perform any duties within the body, within the Senate Chamber, until he was sworn in?

Mr. CONNALLY. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then he is not a Senator until he is sworn in.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator a question. The Senator went to the Philippines last year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. When Congress met the Senator had been reelected, but the Senator was not here and could not be here and did not take the oath for a month or so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was a Senator-elect.

Mr. CONNALLY. You were a Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I was a Senator-elect, and under a law which was enacted just a year or two ago, under a specific statute, my salary was paid.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not criticizing the Senator; I think he was right.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman from West Virginia has been only a Senator-elect. He has not been a Senator within the terms of the constitutional provisions, and will not be until he takes the last step necessary, namely, to be sworn in as a Senator.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me proceed a moment or two, and then I will yield. I have done nothing but hold an experience meeting.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I further explain, just a moment——

Mr. CONNALLY. Please let me say this, that I was not criticizing the Senator. I think he was a Senator during all the time he was away.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I want to explain the actual difference between a Senator and a Senator-elect.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think I know the difference.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was on the sea, and I was intensely interested in a vote here in the Senate. I telegraphed the Secretary of the Senate to have me paired, and that was declined by the Senate, on the ground that I was not a Senator but a Senator-elect. That is the difference.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is perfectly apparent why that happened. It was because the Constitution provides that Senators and Representatives shall take an oath. It does not provide when the oath shall be taken, and there is no penalty attached, but Congress, acting under the authority of that provision, prescribed an oath which Senators must take before they begin their legislative duties.

Will anyone say that a Senator cannot draw his pay from the beginning of his term? What does the Constitution say the term shall be? It says the term of a Senator shall be for 6 years. If he is Senator for only 4 years or 5 years or 5½ years, what does it mean? What gives a Senator the right to draw his pay? If one is not a Senator, he is not entitled to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is only because of a statute recently enacted. In my own case, for instance, where I was out of the country and did not return until February 8, I would have received no salary from the beginning of the session up until February 8, when I was sworn in, if that statute had not been enacted.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In just a moment. I referred to the oath. In 1789 the First Congress provided for the taking of an oath by Senators and Representatives, and this was provided:

> The said oath or affirmation shall be administered within 3 days after the passing of this act, by any one Member of the Senate, to the President of the Senate, and by him to all the Members and to the secretary. * * * In case of the absence of any Member from the service of either House, at the time prescribed for taking the said oath or affirmation, the same shall be administered to such Member, when he shall appear to take his seat.

The statute recognized that they were Members before they appeared and before they took their seats.

Who is it who takes an oath of office? It is a Senator. Who is it that takes an oath of office? It is a Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MINTON. It is a Senator-elect, is it not?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; we do not say anything about Senators-elect. The Constitution says Senators and Representatives shall take a certain oath. What is a Senator-elect? A Senator-elect is a man elected in November. Of course, he is a Senator-elect until his term begins. He is either a Senator or he is not a Senator from the first day of that term. When he appears to take the oath, if he is seated, his term has been confirmed back to its beginning. If he is ousted or rejected, he never was a Senator at all—theoretically, at least.

Mr. President, I do not care to pursue that line of argument. I desire to answer the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on the Shields case.

In the Shields case the question was decided as to whether or not the election was void. I wish Members of the Senate to remember this. Our contention is that in the present case the election was void. If it was void, no one can derive from it any title, either suspended title, or title in abeyance, or any other title. If the election is void, it is just as though there never was an election.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator permit me to complete my answer to the question? Then I will yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question in that connection?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas with the consent of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Assuming that the question as to the eligibility or right of the Senator-elect to serve as a Senator had never been raised, how could the Senator from Texas say that the election was void? Under those circumstances he would have served out his full term. Clearly, the election was only voidable.

Mr. CONNALLY. The point I am trying to make is that whether it is void or not void is not dependent on what Mr. HOLT does. He cannot by anything he does make vital and alive something that is void. If the election is void, it is as though it were never held. The two senatorial precedents which I am trying to call to the attention of the Senate both held that the elections in question were void.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Texas seems to lay a great deal of stress upon these precedents. Does the Senator think that a vote of the Senate, 14 to 12—that vote was, of course, when the Senate was a small body—is binding?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will answer that we do not have to pay any attention to anything. Under the Constitution we have the right to pass upon the qualifications of Senators; and if a 15-year-old boy came up here with a certificate of election, and we seated him, he would be a United States Senator, and there is no power on earth which could take him out except the people at the next election.

Mr. McKELLAR. To show that such a decision by the Senate is not binding, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the case of Mr. Lorimer, of Illinois.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not argue that point, Mr. President. I know it is not binding.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will remember the case of the former Senator from Illinois, Mr. Lorimer. On March 1, 1911, by a vote of 46 to 40, he was held to be a duly qualified and properly elected Senator. Nearly 2 years later——

Mr. CONNALLY. We unseated him.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; nearly 2 years later this body by a vote of 55 to 28 held that he was not entitled to be a Senator, and removed him from the Senate by that vote. So I say that a case which seems to me to have been misapprehended, at least in part—a case which was decided away back yonder in 1793—is not binding on this body.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator can go further back than that. The Constitution was adopted 3 or 4 years before that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and if the Senator will permit me to read from the Constitution I will show the difference between the two cases which the Senator cites and the case at bar. I read:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years.

When it comes to the authority which the Senator cites, let us read it:

> No person shall be a Senator * * * who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

There is a great deal of difference between the qualifications in the Gallatin and Shields cases and in the present case. In both the Gallatin case and the Shields case the Senators-elect were not citizens when elected. The only question in the present case arises under the first sentence in clause 3 of section 3 of article I of the Constitution, that the Member must be 30 years old before he can be a Senator—in other words, before he can take the oath, which is the last step to be taken in order to become a Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. Of course, I do not raise any issue that we are bound to follow those precedents. A precedent, however, ought to be persuasive. It is said that the vote was only 14 to 12. Well, 14 to 12 is just a little stronger than 12 to 14.

Mr. McKELLAR. But it is not always right.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; not if the Senator disagrees with it. The Senator says, "Away back yonder in 1793." He says, "Shall we pay attention to a precedent in 1793?" Mr. President, the reason why I give so much deference to it is that the very men who were seated in the Congress when the question arose had been in Philadelphia and had an opportunity, in ratifying the Constitution, to discuss its provisions and knew what they wanted to put in the Constitution.

The Senator pokes fun at the Shields case. Who were these people who decided the Shields case?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield in a moment.

Who were the Senators who participated in the Shields case? There was an old fellow who used to live down in South Carolina; let me see—what was his name?

Mr. SMITH. John C. Calhoun.

Mr. CONNALLY. John C. Calhoun. Calhoun took part in the debate. He argued on this question. He agreed that the election of Shields was void from the beginning. But Senators say, "Why, Calhoun has been dead since 1850!" Yes; he has been. He has been dead since that time and the enthusiasm of many of his followers is also dead.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I have followed this case, and I have also read the cases of Gallatin and Shields. In those two cases Gallatin and Shield were ousted on the ground that they had not been citizens of this country for a sufficient length of time when elected. Suppose they had not appeared before this body until after the 7 or 9 months which they lacked of being of the proper citizenship age; what would have occurred had they presented themselves after they had been here a sufficient length of time to have qualified under the citizenship qualification?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to answer the Senator. Of course, I assume what would have happened, but I should hate to divulge my assumption. I do not know what would have happened, but I shall state what I assume would have happened.

Mr. SMITH. The point I make is this: They would have been of the proper age when they appeared before the Senate. The only prohibition prior to that time would have been that at the time of their election they were not eligible by reason of not having been citizens for a sufficient length of time, but when they appeared here in the Senate they would have been eligible. In that respect the present case would have been parallel to theirs.

I maintain that the State of West Virginia knew, at the time it elected this young man, that he was not of eligible age. So far as the State is concerned, it has the right in almost all particulars to determine what it sees fit to do.

Mr. CONNALLY. If that is the Senator's attitude, there is no use of my arguing with him. I cannot argue with any view such as that.

Mr. SMITH. However, when the Senator-elect comes here we have a right to determine his qualifications.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; and we are now trying to do it. That is what we are trying to do at the present moment.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator does not pretend to say that the State has not a right to determine the qualifications of the man it sends here?

Mr. CONNALLY. I certainly do. That is exactly what I say. The State has nothing on earth to say about his qualifications. The State ought to pick one who is qualified, but under the Constitution there is no tribunal on earth except the Senate itself which has any jurisdiction to determine the qualifications and the eligibility of a Senator.

Mr. SMITH. That is precisely the point I am making; but the State of West Virginia saw fit to send a certain individual here. We have no right to deny a man entry into the Senate. We can, however, pass upon his qualifications after he becomes Senator. We have departed from that rule and have passed upon the qualifications of two men before they were sworn in, a procedure against which I protested. Now we who are settling this question have to determine whether or not the present case is on all fours with the cases of Gallatin and Shields.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I am trying to do. I have the Gallatin case here, and I have been trying all afternoon to read from it.

Mr. SMITH. This young man is qualified with respect to age. We have nothing to do with anything except his qualifications when he comes here to be sworn in.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to answer the Senator. The Senator asks me what would have happened in the case of Shields had he waited until after he had become a Senator. Here is what Mr. Calhoun said—and, of course, I assume that Calhoun would have said in December just what he said in January. That is the kind of man Calhoun was. When he had views, he stuck to them. Mr. Calhoun in January, I believe, or was it in February?——

Mr. BULKLEY. In March.

Mr. CONNALLY. No, Mr. President; it was the 28th of February, was it not?

Mr. SMITH. Will the Senator go on and read what Mr. Calhoun said? It does not make any difference when he said it. Let us know what he said.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall try to oblige the Senator. Mr. Calhoun said that the election was void. That means that the election, which had transpired a considerable period before that, was void. If it was void in March, it was still void in December.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, in the use of that language Mr. Calhoun was putting into the Constitution words which are not there. He was saying that the election was void because, when elected, the man had not been a citizen for 9 years.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; when his term began.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; if the election was void, it was void on the day it was held.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not yet answered the Senator's first question, but I will yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it the Senator's position that the candidate must be 30 years of age at the time of the election?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; that is not my position.

Mr. ROBINSON. Or at the beginning of the term?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; at the beginning of the term. My idea is that he must be 30 years of age at the beginning of the term for which he was elected, and not when he was elected.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator has been very courteous in yielding to a great many interruptions, but he has been talking all the time toward the other end of the Chamber.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is because the interruptions all came from that direction.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator turn this way for a moment?

Mr. CONNALLY. Gladly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was prompted to rise by the statement the Senator made with reference to his great respect for the framers of the Constitution. It occurred to me, on reading the very provision, that the Senator is now seeking to amend the provision which we are called upon to interpret. I understood the Senator to state that in his judgment the provision means that no person shall be a Senator who shall not, at the beginning of the term of office for which he is elected, have attained the age of 30 years. The provision which we are called upon to determine reads:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of 30 years.

And there is no phrase fixing the time there. Then the next clause refers to citizenship for 9 years, and there is no clause there fixing the time.

Then we come to the third clause, which reads:

> Or who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State from which he shall be chosen.

Does it not appear to the Senator that since there are 3 separate clauses, 2 of which are not modified by a time clause and 1 of which is modified, then the Senator's argument necessarily leads to the conclusion that he is seeking to interpolate into the first 2 clauses language that is not there?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to answer the Senator. Of course, every time we come to discuss the construction of a statute or the Constitution or anything like that, if we could then go back and rewrite it there would never be any question, because we would simply rewrite it. The Senator from Wyoming suggests that because the Constitution does not provide he shall be 30 years of age at the beginning of his term it is to be assumed that "beginning of his term" does not apply.

In the debates in the Constitutional Convention there was nothing said about it. I take it it was such an obvious thing that no one raised the question. But what is the language? He cannot be a Senator of the United States unless he is 30 years of age—when? When his term begins. When do we become Senators of the United States? Men are elected to the Senate of the United States, but when do they become Senators? They become Senators when their terms begin and they assume the duties of the office except taking the oath. But at the time of this election in the State of West Virginia the Constitution required that Congress should meet on the first day of the term.

I might suggest to the Senator from Wyoming and to other Senators that they themselves are trying to amend the Constitution.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. According to the Senator's idea a Governor who is elected to the United States Senate becomes a Senator at the beginning of his senatorial term, whether or not he resigns as Governor.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I do not contend that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That must follow from what the Senator said.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not contend that. There is a lot of confusion about this Governor business. I hope Senators will bear in mind that my contention is that the election was void. If they will do that, they will realize there is no question about the governorship involved, because when a man is Governor he is eligible to be Senator.

The moment he leaves the Governor's office he can assume the Senatorship. He is eligible. He is qualified by law. Whether he comes at the beginning of the term and takes his seat or not is a question for the Senate to determine. My position is that anybody who continues to serve as Governor after his term as Senator begins is in such position that if the Senate should so desire we could declare the office of Senator vacant and call for another election.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. That has never been done, has it?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think it has been done.

Mr. LONG. That is the same case that we have here today, and we ought to act on that basis in this case.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is only the logic of the Senator from Louisiana. Nobody ever challenged a Governor in that respect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand the Senator's argument he is basing his conclusion on two propositions, one that the election was void because of eligibility.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct. The Senate has held twice in similar cases that the election was void.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senate held it was void if the Senator has placed a proper construction on the Gallatin and Shields cases. The order, as I understand, as made by the Senate in each case, in the Gallatin case said he was not a citizen of the United States for 9 years and in the Shields case that he was not a citizen at the time of his election.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has the two reversed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well; one case held one way and the other case held the other way. I invite the attention of the Senator, that if the Senate at that time had held the views entertained by him, that the candidates did not possess the necessary qualifications at the time of the election, they would have said the election was void; but instead of that they went into the question of time, and that was the time of election, and said that he did not possess the necessary qualifications. If it had been the view of the Senate, and if it was to be a precedent in this case, that the election was void ab initio, then we would have disposed of the case readily and the discussion in the Senate would not have been involved at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to read the resolutions which were adopted in the Shields case. I want to call the attention of the Senator to this, too. In the Shields case, Shields offered to resign and expressed a desire to resign his seat. The Senate declined to let him resign, because to have done so would have been to admit that he was a Senator. They voted on that issue. I read:

On motion by Mr. Turney that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Hale on the 14th instant, requesting the Vice President to inform the executive of the State of Illinois that James Shields has this day resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States,

After debate * * * on motion by Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, that the motion lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. Douglas, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senate, the roll was called.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Read the resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am trying to turn to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have it here. I will read it if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to have the Senator proceed to read it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. All right. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, he did not possess the qualifications at the time.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; he did not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. All right. Then why did they not put it on that ground?

Mr. CONNALLY. Because he did not possess the qualifications either at the beginning of his term or when he was elected. If the Senator will permit me, I will read Senator Calhoun's motion to him. Senator Calhoun moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "when elected" and inserting "at the beginning of his term", and that amendment was adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that they recognized a difference between the time of his election and the beginning of his term.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure. We all recognize that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Texas does not recognize that. He says the election was void at the time of the election.

Mr. CONNALLY. It was. The election was void. I do not mean, of course, the whole election for other offices.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I mean the election of the candidate for the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. The election was void because the man could not become eligible at the beginning of his term.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why did not the Senate distinguish in the Shields resolution by striking out the statement that he was not eligible at the time of the election, and putting in, in lieu thereof, "at the time of the beginning of the term of office", is he was ineligible at both times?

Mr. CONNALLY. Because it was quite important to lay down the rule.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. ROBINSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois if the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, just one second. I did not rise particularly to justify my distinguished predecessor, or to advocate the rights concerning General Shields or Mr. Douglas; but I think an important matter in history has been wholly overlooked.

General Shields was assailed on the ground, not that he was not eligible for election as Senator, but that he was not an American citizen. He sought to be given an opportunity to return to be reelected or again chosen by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, assuming that he would be a citizen by that time, having ripened into citizenship. I make bold to say to the able Senator from Texas that the question there, as I see it, was not as to his ineligibility to be a Senator, but that he was ineligible to be any kind of an officer of any nature whatever in the United States, because he was not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I will say to the Senator from Illinois that he was a citizen, and had been a citizen for nearly 9 years.

Mr. LEWIS. He had assumed to be.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senate held that he was a citizen.

Mr. LEWIS. Examination developed that his naturalization was not legal, and therefore that he was not a citizen.

Mr. CONNALLY. The issue did not turn on that question in that case.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to my able friend that we have discussed the matter so much, to and fro, that I fear he will discover in the written history of Illinois that that was the sole issue on which the whole question did turn, although there may be a difference of opinion between my able friend and myself as to the construction of the language which he reads.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. This is a Senate document.

Mr. LEWIS. And as usual very unreliable.

Mr. CONNALLY. My information is confined to the debates in the Senate and to the documents relating to this particular contest. I do not doubt the Senator's construction of the literature of Illinois, because, of course, he is much better qualified to speak with regard to any literature than is the Senator from Texas.

Now, I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that when this resolution was pending in the Senate—

On motion by Mr. Underwood further to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "was void" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "does not entitle him to a seat as such in this body", it was determined in the negative.

That motion was defeated. Why? Because it had been suggested in the debate by Senator Foote that if the matter could be postponed until December, by which time General Shields would have been for 9 years a citizen, they would try to seat him. So, for that reason, they were trying to meet the same question that Senators are urging here: "Postpone this matter. Let him wait"; and, when it was proposed, the Senate voted it down.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But it is true that on further reflection they took that clause out of the resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; they did not take out the word "void." The resolution says, "the election was void."

Mr. BANKHEAD. At a fixed time; not at the time of his election.

Mr. CONNALLY. At the time his term started.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. President, let me submit another question, and then I will let the Senator proceed.

As I gather from the report of the majority of the committee, in both cases at the time of the election, at the commencement of the term of office, at the time the Senator-elect appeared here to begin his duties, and at the time of final action by the Senate both candidates were confessedly disqualified.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, it not being necessary to a decision in the case, but the judgment being confessedly correct because of the disqualification at the time the Senate acted, does the Senator think the decision fixing the time when a Senator must be qualified was directly involved; or is it mere obiter dictum, constituting no necessary precedent?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas contends that under the constitutional power which the Senate possessed at that time, as it possesses it now, it had a right to determine the election of Shields and the election of Gallatin. It had complete jurisdiction of every matter which related in any wise to their election; and the Senator from Texas contends that under that power it had the right to make a finding that their elections were void, and it did make a finding in both cases holding the elections to have been void. If an election was void, no right could be derived from it. It could not ripen into a title. A thing that is void is just as though it had never happened.

I want Senators to know what the Senate did. Here is the resolution. They then sought to amend it by permitting General Shields to resign.

On motion by Mr. Douglas to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved" and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"That the Vice President be requested to notify the executive of the State of Illinois that the Honorable James Shields has resigned his seat in this body."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 32.

On motion by Mr. Douglas—

The yeas and nays were called.

Here is what they held in that case. Listen to it, Senators:

Resolved, That the election of James Shields—

"The election"; nothing about his age; nothing about his citizenship or when he would become a citizen—

Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

We may indulge in all the quibbles that we please over language and over the construction of statutes; but is there anything more plain, is there anything clearer, is there anything more free from doubt than the language of the resolution in the James Shields case? That case is an absolute precedent for this case, because age and alienage are in the same clause, and everyone admits that the same provisions apply as to having attained the age of 30 years and having been for 9 years a citizen of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. While I do not altogether agree with the deduction drawn by the Senator from Texas, I am forced to do so to a large extent. I rise to ask him if he does not agree with this construction:

If Congress should say, when someone appeared who was not eligible at the time he presented himself to be sworn in, that he could not take his seat at that time because he was ineligible, but that its unfavorable action would not preclude it from taking favorable action at another time, then the argument that the claimant might come at a later time, having presented himself not when he was ineligible but when he was eligible, and be sworn in, would be sound. One of the precedents, however, must be wrong. Either at the time Mr. Shields came the resolution should have read that at that time he was not eligible, and the Senate could not seat him at that time, leaving the door open for him to come back later; or, if he was not eligible then, and the Senate declared the office vacant, then the precedent that he could have waited and come in later and been sworn in is not sound.

It strikes me that what we are confronted with here is a choice between two alternatives, and that if Mr. Holt should be seated today, hereafter when someone is elected who is below the age limit, if he presents himself when the term begins, we should declare in the subsequent case, where the man presents himself at the beginning of the term and is not of age, that the seat is not vacant but that he is not eligible at that time only; because if he can come in later, we certainly ought not to declare the seat vacant simply because he comes a week before he becomes eligible and, using that as a pretext, say that he can never come again.

My dilemma is as to which one of these two precedents is a sound one. Certainly, if we are to vote to seat Mr. Holt today, if he had come last January the appropriate action then would have been to say that he could not be seated at that time but to leave the door open and not to declare the office vacant.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Arkansas says that if that had happened he would have been out, and that he never could have come again.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is the difficulty. There are two philosophies in conflict.

Mr. CONNALLY. The reason why they are in conflict is that one of them is absolutely erroneous.

Mr. TYDINGS. They cannot be consistent.

Mr. CONNALLY. We have to adopt one theory or the other, either that he was legally elected or that he was illegally elected.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I say to the Senator from Texas, if Mr. Holt is to be seated today because he is now eligible—and I see good argument to support that point of view—had Mr. Holt come here at the beginning of his term, on the 3d or 4th of January, we would have made a mistake in declaring that he was ineligible and that the office was vacant.

What we should have done in January, had he then presented himself, in order to be consistent with the action about to be taken today, would simply have been to say that he was not eligible at that time, and let the time transpire until he was eligible.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what has happened, in effect.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but we have two policies here which conflict, and if Mr. Holt is seated today, and in the future some person is elected who is not eligible when his term begins, on account of his age, I shall not vote to declare the office vacant, but will vote to say that at the time he is not eligible, but that if he presents himself later he may be seated, because we must be consistent; we cannot blow hot and cold in this matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. That will be the effect if the Senator is seated; it will be a precedent, and others similiarly situated will wait and not present themselves until they attain the constitutional age.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield for one more observation?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Suppose Mr. Holt had come on the 18th day of June, the day before he became eligible; according to the argument offered by those who back up the Shields case, then we would have declared not only that Mr. Holt was ineligible but that the seat was vacant; but if he had come on the next day we would have held that he was eligible.

It strikes me that had Mr. Holt come on the 18th the proper action, in view of what we seem about to do, would have been to declare on the 18th that Mr. Holt was not then eligible, and that he could not be sworn in then, but to say nothing about the seat being vacant. That would have made our position consistent with swearing him in the next day.

I think the real contention here arises from the fact that we are arguing from two different precedents, both of which have good reasons behind them, but which are in conflict, and there is no consistency to that kind of an argument as it relates to the dates I have given as an example, the 18th and 19th of June.

Mr. CONNALLY. Those difficulties are difficulties into which we will continually run if we adopt the theory of those who are standing for the majority report.

Let me explain to the Senator from Maryland, if he is interested——

Mr. TYDINGS. I am interested.

Mr. CONNALLY. That the situation which he represents, according to the admissions of the Senator from Arkansas and other proponents of the majority report, is that if on one day at 12 o'clock noon the gentleman from West Virginia, not a Senator, should come to this door and present his credentials, the Senate would say, "No; you are ineligible, and your seat in the Senate is vacant"—but if he takes his watch and waits until the following day at noon and comes up the Senate says, "Come right in. You are a Senator. You were duly elected, and there is no reason why you cannot take the seat."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Texas think that that very strange phenomenon results from the fact that if on the 18th the sole reason why Mr. Holt cannot take his seat is that he is then ineligible but will subsequently become eligible, the proper action for the Senate to take on the 18th would be to hold that for that day he could not be sworn in?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senate could do that.

Mr. TYDINGS. If I may continue for just a moment, what we have done has been to declare that the seat would be vacant because he comes 24 hours before the date when he might have come and had his eligibility passed upon favorably. Certainly those two philosophies are in violent conflict, and if Mr. Holt is seated today, as I believe he will be, and I probably will vote to seat him, in the future if any Senator-elect presents himself at the bar at the beginning of his term and he is ineligible on account of age, I would not vote to declare him ineligible permanently, or his seat vacant, but would vote only that he must stand aside until he becomes eligible. Otherwise, there would be no consistency in voting that Mr. Holt is eligible today.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Texas, along the line of the argument he presents in regard to the Shields case, where it is insisted that the election was void, and the able Senator insists that it was void on the facts there shown, does the Senator draw the deduction, and express it as his judgment, that the election of a gentleman who was not 30 years of age at the time of his election would be void?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I think he must be 30 years of age at the beginning of his term.

Mr. LEWIS. So there is no parallel between the Shields case and this case as to the election being void?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think there is. Age and alienage are covered in the Constitution in the same clause, and the same rule applies to age as to alienage. If a man is not 30 years of age at the beginning of his term, my contention is that his election was void.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator does not draw a distinction between the provision that one must be 30 years of age to be a Senator and the provision in the last clause that he shall have been an inhabitant of the State when elected, the distinction being in one instance that they make the basis of the eligibility that he shall be an inhabitant and in the other instance that he must be 30 years of age?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator recognizes the distinction, and I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the inhabitancy clause is not involved in any of these cases. This is the language:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years and been 9 years a citizen of the United States.

Those are the two clauses which are involved in these cases. In the Shields case and in the Gallatin case the question was not whether the person was an alien, but whether he had been a citizen for 9 years. The case here is whether the person is 30 years of age. Both of those provisions are in the same clause, and both have the same binding effect.

Mr. LEWIS. But the Senator will observe one still could not be a Senator even if he had both qualifications, if he was 30 years of age and had been a citizen for 9 years, if he were not an inhabitant of the State, he could not be elected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly not; but the question of being an inhaibtant of the State was not involved in any of these cases.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me the rights of the people of a sovereign State ought to be considered in connection with a case of this kind. Therefore I inquire of the Senator, if in testing whether or not a man is entitled to take his seat on the date and time of the convening of Congress the right of the people of a sovereign State to be represented is not to be considered?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is exactly the contention of the Senator from Texas. The Senator from Texas contends that under the twentieth amendment to the Constitution Congress had to meet on the 3d day of January 1935. The term of the person who was to be elected Senator from West Virginia by constitutional requirement began on the 3d day of January 1935.

Mr. WALSH. And the people of that State had a right to have a man appear here and to be sworn as Senator who was eligible under the Constitution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly. Of course they had. Therefore, I contend that not being so qualified his election was void, and he can derive from it no rights whatever.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator admits that the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia is not now a Senator; does he not?

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, I admit that he is not now a Senator. My contention is that he cannot be a Senator until he is again elected.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator admits that Mr. Holt is not now a Senator. Here is the wording of the Constitution:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years.

Mr. Holt has attained the age of 30 years, and offers himself to be sworn in as a Member of the Senate. Why does not that comply with the very letter of the Constitution? What the Senator from Texas is undertaking to do here is to put in the Constitution something which the Constitution does not contain. He is amending the Constitution by inserting the words "when elected."

Mr. CONNALLY. No; "at the beginning of his term."

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; "at the beginning of his term."

Mr. CONNALLY. I will answer the Senator. The Senator quotes the language of the Constitution:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of 30 years.

Then he turns dramatically and says—

The gentleman from West Virginia is 30 years old!

But in order to be a Senator he must be something else besides 30 years old. In order to be a Senator one must have been elected in an election at the time when he was eligible to accept the office when the term began.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no such requirement in the Constitution. The Senator is interpolating into the Constitution words and language which it does not contain.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not expect to convince the Senator from Tennessee. I get no pleasure out of taking the position which I take here today. I should much prefer to vote to seat the gentleman from West Virginia. I wish to seat every man who has a right to a seat in this body. He belongs to my party. He sits on this side of the aisle. I have a warm and an abiding affection for his colleague [Mr. NEELY], who graces the chair at this moment, and every impulse of my carnal nature calls for a vote for Mr. Holt. On the other hand, every impulse of my intellectual nature tells me that I cannot do it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to this provision in the Constitution:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

The language is:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected—

I suppose the Senator from Tennessee would say that that does not apply to Mr. Holt, who is applying to be seated here; and in order to apply to him, we would have to change that language as follows:

During the time that he was a Senator.

But the language in the Constitution is—

During the time for which he was elected.

Showing that the intention of the framers of the Constitution was to apply all those things to the beginning of the term.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I suggest that that shows exactly the opposite intention. When the framers of the Constitution intended it to apply for the term for which he was elected, they said so very plainly. When they intended it to apply only to the time when he should be a Senator, they said that very plainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think both Senators are wrong. What that clause was intended to do was to prevent a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives from vacating his seat in the Senate or in the House and accepting more lucrative employment in an office which had been created while he was serving in the Senate or in the House. That is the object of that provision; so it has nothing on earth to do with the immediate question which we are trying to discuss, as I see it.

I now desire to do something which I have been endeavoring for an hour and a half to do, which is to read the resolution of the Senate in the Gallatin case, and see just what the Senate decided.

On motion to adopt the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the election of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States—

That is what they were electing him for—to be a Senator of the United States when his term started—was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States.

Mr. President, that is the decision in the Gallatin case. In the Shields case practically the same resolution was adopted, except that it was provided that Shields was not eligible at the beginning of his term. That is the attitude of the Senator from Texas—that he must have been eligible to hold the office when the office began. Why? Because the Constitution requires that Senators be elected for a term of 6 years. The Constitution says when their term begins and when their term ends.

Mr. President, if this were a case in which the incumbent continued to serve until his successor was qualified, we should have a different situation; but that is not true. In the case of Senators and Representatives their terms are definite, and when the term expires there is a vacancy created unless the people who have the power of election shall have in the meantime elected someone to be the successor. The Constitution intended that the people should have the successor provided, so that when the period of the predecessor should come to an end there would be a qualified Senator or a qualified Member of the House of Representatives ready to take the place of the one who had gone out of office.

Let me say in this case that it developed in the hearings that Mr. Holt, in the campaign in West Virginia, had said that he was eligible. I do not mean to intimate that he deceived anyone. He told them frankly how old he was. He told the people of West Virginia that he was under 30 years of age at that time. He told them when he would become 30 years of age, but he did argue to the people of West Virginia that he was eligible notwithstanding that fact. I understand he cited the case of Henry Clay. The people of West Virginia no doubt thought he would be seated when he came here in January. That probably had an influence on his election, because he said he was eligible for the office, and the term began in January.

I do not wish the Senate to draw any unfavorable deductions from my statements regarding that, because much to the credit of Mr. Holt, he did frankly and openly state the fact to the people of the State of West Virginia, and openly admitted that he was not 30 years of age; but he added that he was eligible, arguing that notwithstanding the fact that he was not 30 years of age, no doubt he would be seated when he came to the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I think it was developed in the committee that the argument on his part that he was eligible was an erroneous legal conclusion; that there was no intentional misstatement of fact, but that it was an erroneous legal conclusion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no. I have just said that he stated frankly his age, but he did argue as a legal conclusion, as suggested by the Senator from New Mexico, that he was eligible, and he probably thought he would be seated had he appeared here in January. He chose not to appear, and consequently did not present his credentials.

If a person elected a United States Senator can be ineligible for 6 months and then appear and qualify, he could wait 5 years and 6 months, or, if we pursue the logic of that statement to its final conclusion, a candidate might wait until the last month of his term and then present himself to take the oath of office. He might not come at all, for that matter, but this is a case in which, in order to have a precedent, he must come.

If the people can elect a man under 30 years of age to the Senate, they can elect one 25 years of age, and he could come to the Senate after reaching 30 years of age and serve only a portion of the last year of his term.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. Could the Governor have made an appointment to fill the office in the meantime?

Mr. CONNALLY. It would depend on the laws of the State. The Constitution says if there is a vacancy in the Senate the Governor may appoint provided the legislature of the State has enacted a law making provision for appointment by the Governor in case of a vacancy. If the Governor undertook to make an appointment, of course the Senate would finally have to pass on the matter.

Mr. ADAMS. How would the Senator from Texas vote on that question? Suppose the Governor of West Virginia had sent an appointment declaring West Virginia entitled to another Senator?

Mr. CONNALLY. If he had sent an appointment valid under the laws of West Virginia, the Senator from Texas would have voted to seat the appointee.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not believe the Governor could appoint any one until the Senate declared the seat vacant.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think we would have to wait until the Senate declared a vacancy. If the Governor had authority under the laws of West Virginia to make an appointment, he could at least try to make the appointment and when the appointee presented his credentials the issue would arise at once and we could decide it either way under our plenary authority, and no one could question it. We could seat whomever we saw fit to seat, because this is the final supreme court on questions of eligibility to membership in the body.

Mr. ADAMS. Could the Governor of West Virginia have appointed a Senator to serve until the time Mr. Holt was 30 years of age?

Mr. CONNALLY. And then let Mr. Holt come in and take the oath of office?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I do not believe so.

Mr. ADAMS. Had there been a vacancy in the office?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think so.

Mr. ADAMS. Why could not the Governor appoint, then?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Governor could appoint at all, he could appoint until the next general election. I assume it is the law in West Virginia, as it is in most other States, that the Governor can appoint only until the following general election. Mr. Holt could, of course, enter that general election. Tomorrow, if Mr. Holt should not be seated, the Governor of West Virginia could call an election and Mr. Holt could become a candidate and, if elected, get legal title to his seat, and come back to the Senate. Of course, that is what I think he should have done, and come here without any tarnish, without any doubt, without any cloud on his title.

Mr. President, much has been said about the rights of a sovereign State and the rights of the people of a sovereign State. The people of the State have a perfect right to choose whomsoever they see fit to sit in the Senate to represent them, provided the one so chosen possesses the constitutional qualifications. But a United States Senator, while selected by a State, serves not simply the State but he serves the United States as well. The other 47 States of the Union have an interest in all the States being properly represented in the Senate of the United States.

It was the conception of the founders of the Government, those who shaped and molded the Constitution, and it was their expectation and their hope that every State should have two Senators here at all times. Why?

Because the Constitution specifically provides that the Senate shall be composed of two from each State chosen by the people for a term of 6 years. That is the term for which they are chosen. Could we choose a Senator for part of a term? We must choose him for the whole term and not for less than 6 years. If he is not eligible when that term begins, his title is not sufficient. He cannot be elected for 5½ years or for 4 years, but he must be elected for 6 years.

I say the whole Nation has an interest in every State being represented in the United States Senate, and the people of West Virginia have a right to have two Senators on the floor of the Senate at all times. Of course, sometimes it is physically impossible by reason of death or illness, to have them here each moment, but the people still have the representation, though the Senator may not be able to be physically present in the Chamber every moment.

Let me ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] a question. There are other duties which a Senator performs besides sitting in the Chamber. He appoints candidates for West Point and candidates for Annapolis. Could not a Senator appoint those candidates before he takes the oath of office? Would he have to wait until he was sworn in before he could appoint to Annapolis or West Point?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know whether that could be done, but if it is done, it is permitted as a matter of courtesy. The Senator-elect would take his oath of office later and then his appointments would relate back, as we used to say in the law, nunc pro tunc. That is about the only justification for such an appointment.

I agree with the Senator entirely when he says that the Senator-elect is not a Senator until he complies with the terms of the Constitution. He will have to take the oath of office before he can become a Senator within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the gentleman from West Virginia had presented himself a month ago, would not the Senator from Tennessee have had to vote against seating him?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think I would have voted to defer the matter until he should have reached the age of 30 years.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator would have voted to defer?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my judgment.

Mr. CONNALLY. But if the question had come directly on the issue of whether he should be seated, how would the Senator have voted?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. That question is not before us. The question comes now in this clear way. The Senator-elect has all the qualifications and he has been duly elected by a large majority.

Mr. CONNALLY. He has all of the qualifications except one.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is now 30 years of age. He is now applying to us to be allowed to complete his election by being sworn in. Regardless of the precedents I think he is entitled to be sworn in.

The Senator having asked me a question, I want to say that I believe in precedents, but here we have one where there was no record vote and we have another where there was a vote of 12 to 14. The 12 were just as likely to be right as the 14. We are the sole judges of the qualifications of the Members of this body. This body is the sole judge of the qualifications of the Senator-elect from West Virginia. I believe he is entitled to his seat. I think the Senate ought to vote for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia directing that the Senator from West Virginia be sworn in.

In the first place, I do not believe these precedents apply to this particular case. I think they both arose under different facts, in different situations from the case of the Senator from West Virginia. I think we ought to decide the application of the Senator from West Virginia on the facts as they appear here. I think he comes directly within the very wording of the Constitution, and I think we ought to uphold the Constitution by giving him his seat.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Tennessee says the gentleman from West Virginia has all the requisite qualifications. He has all of them except one, and that is that he was not legally elected at a time when he was eligible to be a Member of the Senate at the beginning of his term.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator-elect from West Virginia was elected, as I recall, by something like fifty or sixty thousand majority. He was overwhelmingly elected.

Mr. CONNALLY. What has that to do with the question before us?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is not a charge against the fairness or justice of his election. He has been elected, and he is entitled to take his seat at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what difference does it make whether he was elected by 50,000,000 votes or by 50 votes? If he was elected, of course, he has a right to his seat. The Senator from Tennessee is making an argument in favor of seating the gentleman from West Virginia because he was elected by 50,000 majority. I assume from that that if the gentleman from West Virginia had been elected by a majority of only 10,000, the Senator from Tennessee would not have been nearly so enthusiastic about his election.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should not be quite so enthusiastic, because there might have been some reason for a slip-up.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Tennessee then would not have been so anxious to seat him. Mr. President, if I thought the gentleman from West Virginia was eligible at the beginning of his term, if he came here with a margin of 1 vote, I should fight just as hard to see that he was seated as I should if he came here with a certificate showing that he had a million majority. What difference does the size of the vote make in this case?

Mr. McKELLAR. It makes a lot of difference with the Senator-elect himself, and it makes a lot of difference with all of us, as to the size of the majority.

There has not been a question raised as to the absolute fairness and the absolute integrity of the election. The opponent of the Senator-elect has not charged that there was any wrongdoing in the election. The people of West Virginia knew when they voted that the Senator-elect would not be 30 years old until the 19th of June; so I say there can be no charge of wrongdoing in connection with his election.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, nobody is accusing him of wrongdoing.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator-elect now being eligible in every sense to take the oath of office and complete the election, I think he ought to be allowed to do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, of course, there is no use trying to reply to the Senator from Tennessee, because when a Senator does so he merely provokes another eloquent speech from him.

I have undertaken in this very disordered and somewhat disorganized fashion to point out to the Senate the reasons why I cannot vote to seat Mr. Holt from West Virginia. I desire to say that in the main I agree with the minority views of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], which are set forth in a report filed in the RECORD, and appearing this morning.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, since the Senator from Texas has admitted that one does not become a Senator merely by the commencement of the term, I should like to have him point out where he finds in the Constitution anything about qualification relating to the commencement of a term.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Constitution does not say anything about the beginning of the term or the end of the term.

Mr. BULKLEY. It simply says, "be a Senator."

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; "be a Senator"; when? When? Why, when his term begins. When are you a Senator, if you are ever one? It is when you are elected and your term begins.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator has just admitted that the claimant from West Virginia is not yet a Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. He is not; and he never ought to be until he is again elected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me answer. Be fair to me. The Senators are rather Ku-Kluxing me. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not intend to do that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me answer the Senator from Ohio before the Senator from Tennessee interrupts me.

We are now talking about the Senate. The Constitution says:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

All right. Let us see what it says about the Senate.

The Senate of the United States—

What is the Senate? It is a continuing body. It does not die every 2 years or every 6 months. It is a continuing body.

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators—

Why not say "two Senators-elect"? We keep on talking about "Senators-elect." The Constitution does not say anything about "Senators-elect"; it says "Senators."

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State—

Not from some of the States. It does not say that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from 47 States, and, in the case of the forty-eighth State, one Senator for 6 years, and one for 5½ years. It says:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State—

Well, now, let us see. How do they get to be Senators?—

elected by the people thereof—

Elected for what?—

for 6 years.

Not 5½ years. If the people can elect a Senator for 5½ years under these circumstances, when does the 5½-year term start? Does it begin in January; and when he has served 5½ years, does he have to get out; or can he, at his convenience, wait 6 months and then take his seat, or wait 2 years, or 3 years, or 4 years, or 5 years?

Our duty is to ascertain what the Constitution means. The Constitution means what the writers of the Constitution meant at the time they wrote it, under a reasonable construction. Is there any Senator here who can believe that the Constitution makers ever intended that the Senate should be composed of men who were not eligible to meet at any moment and to discharge their functions? I cannot believe it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose there were two vacancies in the representation from a State, and there were two Senators-elect, and both of them were under 30 years of age: Would that State be represented in the Senate?

Mr. CONNALLY. It would not be represented at all. The Senator from Massachusetts puts a very striking case. Suppose in the case of the State of West Virginia or any other State, at the same election, because of death or resignation, two Senators were to be elected, and the voters were to elect two men under 30 years of age at the beginning of the term: That State, of course, would be unrepresented.

Mr. WALSH. Or suppose there were two Senators-elect who had not been naturalized for a sufficient number of years.

Mr. CONNALLY. The same rule would apply. According to the contention of Senators who favor the majority report, the Senate might be composed of 32 Senators under 30 years of age, and of 32 other Senators who had not been for 9 years citizens of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, if that situation should exist in 48 States, we should have no Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. We should have no Senate, of course. That is possible. Every Senator-elect could either be under 30 years of age, or he could be a man who had not been for 9 years a citizen of the United States; and so, instead of the clerk and the pair clerk and the other assistants keeping tab on us, and where we were, they would have to keep tab on the new classes, as is done in military conscription—the class of 1933, the class of 1934, and so on. The roll would be called to see who was going to become of age next year, who was going to become of age the following year, and the Senate would have to keep track of the naturalization records, and have the Attorney General report when every Senator had been naturalized for 9 years, and send us that list, and then we should know just who was going to be here and who was not going to be here.

Now, Mr. President, since there seem to be no other questions, for which I am very happy, I desire to conclude. I wish to have Senators bear in mind all the time, though, that our position is that the election itself was void if the person elected was not eligible at the beginning of his term. If that is true, he never can take his seat. Other Senators contend, "He was legally elected, he is a Senator, but if he had come up in January I would have voted to kick him out", and had we turned him aside in January he never would have returned, he could never have come back to take his seat.

If he was legally elected, if he is ever to be eligible, why should they kick him out in January? He could come back and present himself again if he had title to the seat. But when we adopt the theory that the title falls because he was never legally elected, we are not faced with the difficulties which will rise to confront us if we adopt any other doctrine and any other theory in this case.

I submit, therefore, that Mr. Holt should not be seated for the reason that his election was void because he was not 30 years of age on the 3d day of January 1935, when his term of office began in accordance with the provision of the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] in the nature of a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it is obvious that we cannot reach a vote today on the pending matter, and I understand there is a desire for an executive session. Therefore I think we should go into executive session at this time and let the pending matter go over until tomorrow.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment to enable the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House to a Senate bill?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a national labor relations board, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the following nominations:

Frank C. Walker, of New York, to be executive director of the National Emergency Council;

Jerome F. Sears to be State director, National Emergency Council, for California;

Sveinbjorn Johnson to be State director, National Emergency Council, for Illinois;

Charles J. Hardy to be State director, National Emergency Council, for New York; and

Dr. John W. Cronin to be assistant surgeon in the United States Public Health Service, to take effect from date of oath.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Frank H. Foy to be State director, National Emergency Council, for Massachusetts.

He also, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported favorably the following nominations:

Howard W. Oxley, of New York, to be director of Civilian Conservation Corps camp education; and Silas M. Ransopher, of New York, to be assistant director of Civilian Conservation Corps camp education.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

POSTMASTER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alice L. Woolman to be postmaster at Coweta, Okla.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I ask that this nomination go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will go over.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Monroe Johnson, of South Carolina, to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement regarding Mr. Johnson's nomination.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I had intended to ask that the nomination go over. Would the Senator rather make his statement now?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I told the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that I would withdraw my objection today, and I desire to make a statement for the RECORD as to why the objection is withdrawn.

When the nomination came in last Saturday, the Committee on Commerce was polled, and the nomination was favorably reported to the Senate. On Monday Mr. Ewing Y. Mitchell, whom Mr. Johnson succeeded, made a public statement, including many charges respecting the Department of Commerce. Thereupon Mr. Johnson's nomination was recommitted to the Committee on Commerce. In the Committee on Commerce on the following day five members of the committee voted against reporting Mr. Johnson's nomination to the Senate.

Our reasons—perhaps I should content myself by speaking of my own reasons—my reasons for voting against reporting the nomination were that inasmuch as the position to which Mr. Johnson had been appointed was involved in the controversy which had been stirred up by Mr. Mitchell's charges, I felt that nothing should be done respecting the vacancy until the committee had concluded an investigation of Mr. Mitchell's charges. The committee have for 2 days investigated the charges. We have not yet concluded that hearing. However, in this morning's hearing before the committee I undertook to obtain all possible information respecting any possible question of Mr. Johnson's eligibility. Mr. Mitchell, the retiring Assistant Secretary, who has made the various charges against the Department, was specifically asked if he knew of any reason why Mr. Johnson should not be confirmed, and he said he knew of none. Thereupon we put the Secretary himself upon the stand, and the Secretary made a completely satisfactory statement respecting Mr. Johnson's credentials.

I particularly asked a question which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] had raised, namely, whether or not Mr. Johnson had any investments in transportation companies or similar investments which might represent conflicting interests in respect to the responsibilities which he must administer. The Secretary gave us the assurance that there is no such conflict of interest.

The situation now stands entirely clear so far as I am concerned. We have every assurance that Colonel Johnson is fully qualified for the position to which he has been appointed. I desire to make this public statement and to withdraw my objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination go over until tomorrow. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has no objection to its going over until tomorrow.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Nebraska has said he would like to have the nomination go over, and I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will go over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc, with the exception of the nomination of the postmaster at Coweta, Okla., which has been previously passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters on the calendar, with the exception noted, will be confirmed en bloc.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the nominations in the Navy be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed en bloc.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the nominations in the Marine Corps be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. GEORGE. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, June 21, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 20, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we rejoice that the wide open spaces are full of sunlight and underneath are the everlasting arms.

Whither shall I go from Thy Spirit? Or whither shall I flee from Thy presence? If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me.

O Father of mercy, forgive our sins, cleanse us from all secret faults, and inspire us with humility. Make us rich in love that we may lose ourselves. Fill us with hope that we may endure hardness as loyal servants of the Republic. We pray Thee to consecrate all the relations of family life. May the hearts of fathers, mothers, and children meet together and the old and new be joined in one golden circle. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 7260. An act to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, blind persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. HARRISON, Mr. KING, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2917. An act authorizing an appropriation to the American Legion for its use in effecting a settlement of the remainder due on, and the reorganization of, Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, and men of the expeditionary forces.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 314. An act for the relief of Vito Valentino; and

S. 1052. An act for the relief of the Washington Post Co.

SECOND DEFICIENCY BILL, 1935

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 266.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 266

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8554, a bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1935, and June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, an open rule providing for 2 hours of general debate. For the moment, that is all I care to say about the rule.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, on this side of the aisle we are desirous to have the rule explained by the gentleman from New York. If he will not do so now probably he will do it later. I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to discuss the rule, but not quite so briefly as the chairman of the committee in his opening statement. I am somewhat familiar with the general rules of the House and the intent and purposes of the rules. I am and always have been in favor of special rules. I believe the majority should use special rules whenever necessary to put through its program.

But, with the strength of the majority, there are certain moral obligations that go with it for the protection of the minority. The rules of the House, as everyone knows, are for the protection of the minority. The majority does not need any protection, as far as the rules are concerned, because they have the votes; and that is really the important question.

This is the first time, as far as I know—and I think it is practically the first time in a great many years—when we have had a general appropriation bill before the House and general debate has been denied.

That is entirely a new custom, and I certainly should have been glad to have had the gentleman from New York explain why he did this at this time.

Of course, it is not a question of time. In a discussion with the majority leader and the Chairman of the Rules Committee last evening they both admitted that there was no special important program for the balance of the week.

That being the situation, I cannot understand why we should be cut off from some general debate at this time, considering that that has been the custom of the House for a great many years.

The only conclusion to which I can come is the fact you yourselves to a certain extent are ashamed of the legislation that you are putting through. You have not the courage to get up here and defend the legislation. On the other hand you have not the nerve to sit here and have someone else criticize it, so you have adopted the easiest way and by mere force of numbers cut off general debate. That is a pretty fair and frank statement relative to the position 10 or 15 minutes time for debate. I have said to them what that you have taken in denying general debate.

Several Members upon our side have asked me to get them 10 or 15 minutes time for debate. I have said to them what the Speaker has often said, that he preferred not to have them come in with general debate in the House early in the daily sessions, and that it was better to have general debate during the regular time, which has always heretofore been in order, namely, on appropriation bills.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. As Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I discussed with the ranking minority member on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] relative to confining this debate to the bill, and he urged absolutely no objection. I stated that to the Rules Committee, and, therefore, the Rules Committee is not to blame. If Mr. TABER had urged objection at that time it might have been another story.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed this matter with the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], but I have discussed it with a great many Members on our side who have asked for time. I have tried to protect the program of the House, and have them take their time on general appropriation bills.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But I was justified in relying on the conversation with the ranking member of the minority on my committee.

Mr. SNELL. I have not heard about any such agreement as that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was not an agreement, but there was no objection made to it.

Mr. SNELL. I know that it is not satisfactory and is not the desire of a majority of the Members upon our side to not have general debate on appropriation bills, which is the proper time for general debate. During the entire session I have been very generous in yielding to unanimous-consent requests. I have never intended to interpose an objection merely for the sake of making the objection. The majority has to get unanimous consent and to ask courtesies of the minority much more than the minority has of the majority, because the responsibility is on the side of the majority. Therefore I feel that it is taking an unfair advantage, after the courteous treatment accorded the majority, to refuse us at this time, opportunity for general debate, and I ask now whether that is to be the policy of the majority from now on, that there shall be no more general debate during the present session. If that be so, then I doubt if you will adjourn any earlier or it will in any way shorten the session. I am just as anxious as anyone else here to adjourn and go home, but there are certain rights that I feel we have, and at least one of them is the right of debate. Some gentlemen on the Democratic side may think that they will always have just as large a majority as they have at the present time. I have been here when we had almost as large a majority as there is on the Democratic side at the present time, and as far as I know we never once took advantage of the minority, because of that fact. My position always was that it is perfectly harmless to let the other fellow talk, as long as we have the votes, but gentlemen on the Democratic side seem to go a great deal further, and the only conclusion that we can draw—and I have tried to be fair about it—is that they are not willing to publicly debate and discuss questions brought before the House, and let the people know the real issues that are before Congress. I am appealing to the common sense and fairness of gentlemen on the Democratic side, who claim to be so fair, that this be not made a permanent policy on the part of the majority. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the minority leader has very calmly expressed a complaint about a situation which in fact does not exist. This is not a general appropriation bill. It is a deficiency appropriation bill, containing a number of items which may be controversial.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It has always been the custom in the past, however, to have general debate go along with the consideration of a deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know. Probably that is true; I do not know whether there have been any exceptions to that custom or not, but why do we need a rule for this bill? In the first place, we did not start this. This deficiency bill came in here and could have been taken up in the usual way. It is a privileged bill. It contains certain items of legislation as in most appropriation bills, and when that was called to the attention of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, took an arbitrary position on the matter, and it was he who made the necessity for the rule. He arbitrarily insisted on points of order, and he knew at the time he did it that we would be compelled to bring in a rule, the prime purpose of which is to waive points of order.

What else could we have done? We could have let the general debate go on, and when points of order were made we would have had to postpone the general debate until we could bring in a rule to make those matters in the bill in order. That has been done heretofore, but knowing the position the minority was going to take, and I call it an arbitrary position, as to the matters in this bill, principally because they refer to some controversial or political subjects, we had to bring in a rule.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. TABER. My position in objecting to the request yesterday was based upon my belief that some of these legislative matters contained in the bill ought not to be passed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman could have thrashed that out in the House and he could convince the majority of the House that they should not be passed. The gentleman did not have to express his opposition by making points of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman think that these legislative matters should go to the legislative committee? Why should the Appropriations Committee set itself up as the one determining committee in this House?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot answer that. I do not know enough about it. The Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can probably answer the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was because the chairman of the legislative committee waived it and agreed that it go in this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Did all the members of the legislative committees agree to that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. All except one that I remember of, and I forgot to ask him.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. But there is more than one committee involved.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I said all but one committee, and I forgot to ask him.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman probably misunderstood my question. Did every member of the legislative committee agree to it?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No. I only conferred with the chairman.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Well, the chairman has no right to run the legislative committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is all this tempest in a teapot about? The majority is accused of using its vast majority to stifle general debate. General debate! It might better be called "general abuse." That is what it usually is from the minority side. [Laughter and applause.]

This Congress has been in session for 6 months. We have heard countless political speeches. Under the guise of general debate we have heard the "opening guns" of the next campaign, which is still 15 months away. Further opportunity for such speeches is sought by the minority under the guise of general debate. They want to get up here and talk about everything under the sun except the measure immediately before the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact that this is the last appropriation bill, and that on all others that were passed in this House they have been given all the time they asked for in general debate?

Mr. O'CONNOR. And there let me further say more time than has been granted ordinarily in the past. On the last bill which came in, for instance, the legislative appropriation bill, to accommodate the minority, we let them blow off, you might say, for a whole week.

Mr. SNELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman ought to be a little more careful about his language.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, some of the time yielded to the minority was yielded back to the majority so that the majority could exercise its lungs.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That may be so.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman ought to be a little more temperate in his language. The gentleman says that we are always abusing and blowing off. I think we have been as temperate in debate at this session as the average Democratic Member of the House has been at this time or during any previous administration.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, those comparisons are always invidious, anyway.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. I rather resent that opprobious term, "blowing off", as applied to the magnificent, though somewhat prolonged, burst of oratory that occurred on the legislative appropriation bill when it was under my direction as chairman of the subcommittee. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think we have had enough general debate for this session. There is enough meat in this particular bill to have some real serious discussion of it on both sides. I think at this late date we ought to be through with what is commonly and sometimes vulgarly called "general debate." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, apropos of the subject of general debate and the use to which it is put, in the RECORD of June 17 appeared a speech by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], in which this statement was made:

> The progress of the rest of the world along the road of recovery in comparison with our record shows the folly of many of the Roosevelt experiments. Fifteen countries have started back on the recovery trail.

I shall not read all of the statement, but I will put it in my remarks. But it states that almost all countries have advanced——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want this reservation taken out of my time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is indulging in general debate at this time, which is against the order in the special rule. I am sorry to have to make that point of order, and I ask the Speaker to rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HARLAN. I am discussing the futility of general debate as a method of disseminating false propaganda.

Mr. SNELL. False propaganda! That is general debate. That is exactly what I asked for on this bill and it was denied. I object, and I ask the Speaker to rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HARLAN. We are discussing an appropriation bill. An appropriation bill is connected with the general economic welfare of the country. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the economic condition of the country——

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I insist that the gentleman proceed in order.

Mr. SNELL. What is sauce for the goose is going to be sauce for the gander. If we are not going to have general debate on the bill, we will not have it here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not proceeded sufficiently for the Chair to understand whether he is in order or out of order.

Mr. HARLAN. I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts when he was making this very startling statement about the economic conditions of the country——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is indulging in general debate when he speaks about a specific debate between himself and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, what we are now considering is the rule. It is just a question of whether or not we are going to adopt this rule.

Mr. HARLAN. That is exactly it.

Mr. MICHENER. This does not include general debate on reciprocity treaties, on the tariff, or on other subjects. It is a matter of procedure only, if we are going to be technical. We are considering the adoption of a rule the purpose of which is to make the consideration of a particular bill in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that where the rule under consideration changes the general rules of debate on an appropriation bill, anything that is pertinent to any part of that rule is legitimate in debate in consideration of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Texas is correct, but the gentleman must confine himself to the resolution before the House and not discuss extraneous matters.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, in this connection, not only the resolution but the bill referred to in the resolution can be discussed, I maintain.

Mr. SNELL. The Speaker has ruled on the question.

Mr. MICHENER. In that connection I may say that while sometimes we permit such discussion, it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I maintain that when a rule is brought in for the consideration of a bill that in discussing the rule it is permissible also to discuss the subject matter of the bill referred to in the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the question now under debate is whether there shall or shall not be general debate on the bill. While this debate may involve certain features or provisions of the bill, the Chair does not think it would justify a Member discussing extraneous matter. Discussion on the resolution now before the House applies only to the question of whether there shall be general debate on the bill. This would not authorize a Member to discuss matters which are not germane to the resolution.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, in discussing this rule, said we were limiting justifiable debate, which ought to take place at this time. I am taking the reverse of the argument and contending that debate ought to be limited, because at this particular time debate is being used to disseminate false propaganda and political bunk in the RECORD for propaganda purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is clearly in order if that is the line of discussion.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has just admitted he is disseminating bunk. I think the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HARLAN. I said I am trying to eradicate that and was proceeding to illustrate how general debate has been abused in this House.

Mr. EKWALL. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I renew my point of order that the question of how general debate has been abused in this House is not proper debate on the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a legitimate part of the discussion if the gentleman confines himself to the question of whether or not there shall be general debate on the bill.

Mr. SNELL. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a perfectly legitimate argument.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman said he was going to show it was bunk and propaganda, which is another proposition entirely.

The SPEAKER. The question of whether or not it is bunk is for the Members to decide for themselves.

The Chair cannot undertake to dictate to the gentleman the language he shall use so long as he keeps within the scope he has indicated.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, we have had so much false propaganda spread in the RECORD by the minority for the purpose of destroying confidence in this country that in the consideration of these bills we do not need any longer discussion than is provided in the rule, and I cite the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] as an example of the evil we now face.

I asked the gentleman, after he had made the startling statement that the United States had gone back in business recovery nine points——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio is not discussing the proposition before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to determine that at this stage of the gentleman's argument.

The gentleman from Ohio will proceed in order.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, would it help the Chair if we had the gentleman's words taken down so the Speaker could read his argument?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York complained that the rule was a departure from the usual custom with regard to general debate and the gentleman from Ohio is answering the very point raised by the minority leader by saying that one of his colleagues in the consideration of another rule took advantage of the discussion of the rule by placing in the RECORD facts that did not pertain to the rule. The gentleman from Ohio is answering the very point raised by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard a moment?

The statement the gentleman is discussing I never used in general debate as the term is being considered here.

I was speaking properly on the A. A. A. bill.

Mr. HARLAN. If the gentleman will admit on the floor that the statement he formerly made concerning recovery in the United States is not true, that is sufficient for me.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I will not admit the statement was not true, because it is true. I do not think that has anything to do with this resolution, however.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the meat of this situation is that if this gentleman is permitted to discuss these things the gentleman from Massachusetts must be permitted to discuss the same thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will be permitted to discuss the rule if the gentleman is granted time by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the gentleman from Massachusetts, as the gentleman from Ohio, must confine himself to the subject before the House, and that question is as to the advisability of the passage of this resolution which confines discussion to the bill itself and prohibits general debate.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts the authority for making this most sensational statement that, if true, would have been emblazoned across the front page of every newspaper in the country.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the matter under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot say at this time whether the gentleman is or is not proceeding in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that when debating a rule that would do away with general debate, which but for the rule would be in order, and general debate means discussion of every subject on the face of the globe, all reasons for eliminating general debate are pertinent and in order, and takes in a subject as broad as the universe, and the gentleman certainly can discuss all such reasons.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that any discussion which undertakes to justify or otherwise the question as to whether or not general debate shall be confined to the bill is legitimate, and the Chair so rules, and hopes that the gentleman from Ohio will proceed in order, as the Chair believes he will.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, following the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the effect that the United States had gone in retrograde nine points in the last 2 years, I asked the gentleman his authority for the statement. He said he saw it in the newspapers some place.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio is not following the decision of the Chair, and I respectfully submit the question to the Chair.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I am tracing this propaganda down to its source to show that the time of general debate in this particular instance was used for no other purpose than to start rumors, propaganda, and shake confidence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that propaganda has anything to do with the discussion of the rule under consideration. The Chair may say to the gentleman from Ohio that he should confine himself—and the Chair hopes he will—to a discussion of whether or not it is proper for the House to confine general debate to the bill or whether general debate should be opened to a discussion of all subjects.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the gentleman is trying to justify the resolution by pointing out that if general debate is permitted very little information will be given to the House with reference to the bill and that the time for general debate is used generally for the purpose of giving out statements that are absolutely false and misleading to the country. The gentleman feels that the House should have information on the bill, and for this reason he is arguing in favor of the resolution which restricts general debate to the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Chair has ruled, and no appeal taken from that decision, I should like to proceed.

I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts his authority and he said he saw it in the newspapers. I asked him what newspaper. He said he did not know.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not complying with the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard in opposition to the point of order. This rule restricts debate to the bill. The gentleman from Ohio is showing that this is a better rule than a rule which allows general debate on any subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-seven Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 98]

Bankhead	Ellenbogen	McClellan	Smith, Conn.
Biermann	Fish	McGroarty	Snyder
Brooks	Frey	Mitchell, Ill.	South
Buck	Gasque	Montague	Stack
Bulwinkle	Gassaway	Murdock	Steagall
Cannon, Wis.	Goldsborough	Oliver	Stefan
Casey	Greever	Patman	Tinkham
Clark, Idaho	Haines	Patton	Tobey
Cochran	Hart	Perkins	Tolan
Connery	Hartley	Peyser	Underwood
Cross, Tex.	Hennings	Rankin	Wearin
Dear	Higgins, Conn.	Robinson, Utah	Whelchel
DeRouen	Higgins, Mass.	Rogers, Okla.	White
Disney	Kennedy, Md.	Russell	Wilson, La.
Dorsey	Lamneck	Scrugham	Withrow
Doutrich	Larrabee	Shannon
Eaton	Lemke	Sisson

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty-two Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] will please suspend while the Chair makes this statement: It has always been the custom heretofore in discussing resolutions making in order matters of legislation for Members to be rather liberal in their discussions and not necessarily to confine themselves to the pending resolution.

The Chair thinks that discussion on these rules should not be too narrowly restricted. Of course, under the precedents, a Member must confine himself to the subject of debate when objection is raised. The pending resolution is one which undertakes to limit general debate upon the deficiency bill to 2 hours and to confine the debate to the bill itself. The Chair thinks it is entirely too narrow a construction to undertake to hold a Member, in discussing the resolution either pro or con, to the simple question of whether or not the rule should be adopted, and that it is entirely legitimate discussion for a Member who is undertaking to uphold the rule and to justify confining debate to the bill to cite as illustrations what has occurred in previous discussions. The Chair does not think a Member, in using such illustrations, is justified in answering a speech that has been made upon a previous occasion. However, the Chair repeats that the Chair does think it is perfectly legitimate for a Member who is undertaking to justify the rule to refer to experiences on previous occasions where the debate was not limited to the bill, and the Chair hopes that the gentleman from Ohio will proceed in order.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would a discussion of the new soak-the-rich plan come within the Speaker's rule?

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am asking for information.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe we have already taken up too much time with this discussion, and in the interest of expediting the business of the House I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is the advisability of having prolonged general debate at this time in our legislative program. I submit that that is not advisable, for the reason that general debate is now being used by the minority in the House of Representatives to foment discontent, to shake the confidence of the country, and to disseminate false political propaganda.

It has very little, if any, value so far as one can see or hear in instructing the Members of Congress on the facts back of any of the bills under consideration. For example, on June 17, when we were on general debate on the resolution to bring the agriculture adjustment bill before the House for consideration, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] made the following statement:

The progress of the rest of the world along the road to recovery in comparison to our record shows the folly of many of the Roosevelt experiments. Fifteen countries have started back on the recovery trail, Sweden leading with a 41-percent margin; Hungary is 33 percent ahead of 2 years ago; Italy, 31 percent; Germany, 26 percent; Japan, 17 percent; Canada, 17 percent. Only four countries are worse off than they were 2 years ago: Norway, 1 percent; Belgium, 3 percent; United States, 9 percent; and France, 16 percent.

The utter silliness and absurdity of that statement with reference to the United States ought not to require any refutation at all to any group of men who have lived in this country for the last 2 years. If such a startling condition did exist, it would be six-column, front-page news on every newspaper in the United States.

Some time after the gentleman made the remark, I addressed this question to him:

The gentleman in the early part of his speech gave out some figures; I should like to ask him where he got those figures?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. They were printed in yesterday's Sunday newspaper in a report quoted from the League of Nations.

I subsequently asked him the name of the newspaper, to which he said that he did not know; and I then asked him if it were the Hearst papers, and he said that it was not. These last two questions and answers are not apparent in the record.

I did not, however, believe at the time, nor do I believe now for one moment, that the gentleman from Massachusetts made any intentional misstatements concerning facts which he no doubt had read somewhere and forgot where he read them.

My point in this whole matter is that when one takes the floor of the House of Representatives in debate of any kind there is a serious responsibility on his shoulders as to the authority of the statements made. Particularly at this time of stress in our country, when everyone is still suffering from the nervous strain brought about by the depression, and is constantly fearful that we are going to be precipitated back into the conditions prior to 1933. Many people look upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a very authoritative source, and any statement such as the one quoted above would be fluently quoted throughout the country and no questions asked.

Following the lead of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he got this from a Sunday newspaper, quoting the League of Nations, I examined a number of Sunday newspapers, but could find no such statement. I did see in the New York Times, which is about as authoritative a paper as we have in the country, an article commenting upon a compilation by the National Industrial Conference Board. I understand that this Board is in close association with the League of Nations and would naturally speak for that organization.

That article, which appeared on Monday, June 17, states as follows:

World production in industry showed a gain in April over the average in the first quarter of the year, according to a compilation of the National Industrial Conference Board. In all the principal countries except France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Holland the output was substantially larger than a year ago.

The United States is clearly listed among the nations showing improvement. I also procured a copy of the June edition of the Survey of Current Business, compiled by the United States Department of Commerce, and found that the index for production in April of 1933 was 66, in April of 1934 was 85, and in April of 1935 was 86. I noticed in the copy of today's Washington News a United Press dispatch from Pittsburgh, quoting an address before the National Association of Credit Men, which says:

The United States is now 40 percent out of the depression.

For the sake of the gentlemen on the minority side of the House, who are apparently uninformed, I may say that the depression period referred to ran from 1929 to 1933.

The Department of Commerce issued a statement under date of June 5, reading as follows:

To summarize some of the important changes, it may be noted that farm income in the first 4 months of 1935 was 61 percent above that for the same period of 1933 and 12 percent in excess of that for early 1934. Industrial production was up 41 and 7 percent, respectively, while the increase in employment, retail sales, and foreign trade have also been substantial. Gains in such individual lines as automobiles, electric refrigerators, and rayon have been especially large, and it is interesting to note that a number of commodities are being manufactured and sold in greater quantities than in 1929.

The improvement in purchasing power in rural areas has been much more rapid than in industrial centers so that the farmer has again assumed a more normal position as a consumer. Similarly, the general price rise and the improvement in profits has lightened the debt burden of industry. Further, the problem of the surplus of agricultural commodities has been largely resolved during the past 2 years. While stocks of cotton are still high, other important surpluses have been removed and the present concern is the production of adequate supplies rather than the elimination of existing stocks.

With the enhancement of profits, the distribution of dividends has turned upward, shrinking to about a third of the 1929 volume. The national income as a whole has expanded substantially in the past 2 years and is currently running above the level of a year ago. One of the hopeful signs of recent months has been the resumption of capital financing. While new issues have been largely for refunding purposes they afford evidence of a demand for desirable securities and of the ability of business concerns to meet regulations governing such issuance.

I am taking this time to show the absurd inaccuracy of the statement put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the gentleman from Massachusetts, based on an authority which he had misplaced. But if there were no such authority, the conduct of the gentlemen who are now gloating over the temporary defeat of the national industrial recovery movement would be arguments louder than any word.

During 1932, with the markets of the country constantly shrinking and production being constantly ahead of distribution, the industrial interests of this country realized that they were committing suicide by cutting each others throats, and they could see no way out of the difficulty. Individually, they were most of them honorable, high-class men; but they felt that they must keep their factories going, they must keep in production, and to do so they had to beat their competitors' price. They chiseled and cut; they exploited childhood; they reduced wages to the pauper level; and bankruptcy faced industry everywhere.

In desperation their representatives conceived and planned the National Industrial Recovery Act. They presented it to President Hoover and were unable to get cooperation. After the election of President Roosevelt they did get cooperation, because there was no other way out. Members of this Congress will remember the enthusiastic letters of endorsement that came from leaders of industry all over the United States urging us to pass this act, as well as the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

It is true that they did not want section 7 (a). They wanted the privilege of organizing, controlling prices, and running the show generally; but they did not want their employees to have anything to say. However, in spite of a flood of propaganda sent to us by the Manufacturers Association and the different chambers of commerce throughout the country, 7 (a) was put in; and the thing started off in high hope, the only fly in the ointment being that the same group that realized their own helplessness against their own inherent dishonesty began immediately to chisel and cheat by building up their inventories to mountain heights prior to the effective date of the N. R. A. They wanted to use cheap labor to beat competitors who tried to pay N. R. A. wages. However, that second effort of industry to commit suicide was frustrated, and things started on the upgrade.

Within the last year, we have again begun to operate on an expanding market. That is, distribution has been keeping slightly ahead of production; and as long as that condition exists there is no need of industry trying to protect itself from its own destruction, because factories can be kept open and business obtained without killing competition.

Therefore, just now the system of honesty and fair play, set forth in the Industrial Recovery Act, is no longer needed, and the restraint is somewhat hampering. Consequently a great wave of sentiment came over the country to wipe out the N. R. A., and when the Supreme Court accomplished that fact, at least temporarily, great was the rejoicing therefor.

In 1933 there would have been no rejoicing over the destruction of N. R. A. It was the salvation of industry at that time, and they all knew it because they were on a contracting market; but in 1935 there is great rejoicing. We do not need any more arguments to show our business recovery than the fact that industry realizes that it is again on an expanding market.

All of this detail is pertinent to show the utter absurdity of the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Whoever was the original author of that statement designed it purely as propaganda, to create a canard to go out over the country to give industry and business and banking one more chill in order to try to stop the upward march of commerce.

These gentlemen who talk about the Roosevelt policies shaking the confidence of the Nation, and with the next breath manufacture and disseminate all of the false rumors possible, certainly do not need a very expanded privilege of general debate in the House of Representatives to continue their activities.

I do not say that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts were intentional in this regard, but he was certainly a most subtle agent in the hands of someone who did have an intention to throw one more scare into our people.

On yesterday's mail I received a letter from a man, otherwise sane, containing the following paragraph:

I am given to understand that in our industry—the heavy machinery—with a present total tax load of $187,110,000, on the basis of 1933 pay rolls, taxes would be increased if the social-securities bill is passed, 8 percent in 1936, 23 percent in 1937, and gradually stepped upward to 46 percent in 1949 and after.

And in that letter he enclosed a circular containing most sensational statements about the expenditures of the United States Government during the last 3 years, statements that are so absurd on their face that any normal man ought to be able to see their falsehoods; but the trouble is the people of the United States are not in a nervous condition right now to be normal, and the antiadministration forces, who apparently have very little regard for the truth in their efforts to gain control of the Government in 1936, are willing to say or do anything, regardless of a shadow of truth, to frighten and cajole the electorate.

Their main purpose seems to be to manufacture and spread fertilizer to bring some life to the dead grass roots which they raked over in Illinois the other day. They have no regard as to the poison they may be disseminating to healthy industrial verdure in the process. What they desire is to resurrect the dead.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it ought to be apparent to anyone that continued and prolonged debate in this House, where opportunity is not given to question and produce the authorities of the statements made, can be of little benefit to anyone; and therefore I submit that we ought not have more than 2 hours on this appropriation bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on the passage of the resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 269, nays 95, not voting 65, as follows:

IS THE "DEATH SENTENCE" IN THE SENATE PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY BILL CONSTITUTIONAL?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the constitutional question involved in the public-utilities bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, except for the Constitution of the United States no one of us would be here. We hold office under it. We have sworn to support it. It is the measure of our powers. Beyond those powers we cannot go, and should not try to go, until and unless "We, the people of the United States", who created the Constitution, see fit to extend our powers. It is not our law. It is the people's law. It is our authority to act for the people and their limitation upon our authority.

Because the people can change the Constitution no one can respect the people and representative government if he does not respect the supreme law of the people as interpreted by the people's highest Court.

In the volume and rush of our work, and especially in such a crisis as confronted us in 1933, there is a human tendency to "let the courts" decide the questions of law. In cases where one does not have a clear conviction on the matter one may forgive himself if he decides to leave those questions to the judiciary before whom the case will be carefully briefed and critically examined by opposing counsel and the court.

When, however, one conscientiously comes to a clear conviction that the bill before him is one which he does not have the power to pass, his duty is as clear as his conviction.

I have such a conviction about the pending bill (S. 2796). I refer to that bill because the House bill is not yet reported. It is my conviction that if the Senate bill becomes "law" it will meet with another devastating rebuke from the Supreme Court.

My belief means nothing to you unless the reasons which led me to that belief are reasons that appeal to you. I shall state those reasons. I shall state them in the simplest possible terms because many of my colleagues are not lawyers and yet are without doubt as much concerned about their oaths of office as the best lawyers on the hill.

The question deserves our careful attention for the following reasons; the importance of the legislation with respect to the industry concerned; the number of our constituents affected; the effect of the bill on national recovery, which I consider of major if not supreme importance; the rights and powers of the 48 States; the responsibility of government itself for the existing situation; the fact that this bill is advertised by some of its sponsors as a prelude to other legislation with respect to all other holding companies in industry, newspapers, and so forth; recent Supreme Court history; the fact that parliamentary government the world over is at the bar of current discussion and, last, while not making this in any wise a party matter, because the bill is supported by both Republicans and Democrats, I hope I may be excused for mentioning the prestige of the party in power which is primarily responsible for legislation.

On the latter point I refer to the "hot oil" case held unconstitutional by a vote of 8 to 1; the "gold-clause" case, held valid as to private contracts by a vote of 5 to 4 and unconstitutional as to Government bonds by a vote of 9 to 0; the railroad pension bill held unconstitutional by 5 to 4; the N. R. A. case held unconstitutional by 9 to 0; the Frazier-Lemke bill held unconstitutional by 9 to 0; the Humphrey dismissal held unconstitutional by 9 to 0. Surely the time has now come when we must carefully study the legal as well as social problems presented by proposed bills. Otherwise we "sin against the light" and will be held responsible for our carelessness by our constituents.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE INDUSTRY

The industry concerned is a business representing twelve and one-half billion dollars of actual investment. It reaches into nearly every home in the Nation. It is affected with a public interest. It has made in recent years, and is capable of again making, the largest expenditure of money for extensions and additions to plant and the purchase of durable goods, where our greatest unemployment lies, of any industry in America with the possible exception of railroads and residence construction. It pays taxes for the support of government in the amount of $245,000,000. The bill involves the most delicate questions with respect to the rights and powers of the 48 States and the Central Government. In fact, Dr. Splawn, who conducted the investigation of the industry for the Federal Trade Commission, stated his opinion that the pending bill "is the most important bill which has been before the Congress within a decade" (House hearings, p. 2187).

THE NUMBER OF PEOPLE AFFECTED

It serves nearly 25,000,000 customers, all of whom are entitled to the best service at the lowest cost consistent with a fair return to capital invested. In this connection it may be said that its rates are today lower by comparison with pre-war, 1913, prices than any other group of prices, even those of the farm. In competition with steam, diesel engines, gas, gasoline, and direct water power, it furnishes probably 80 percent of our industrial power. In serving the public the industry employs some 300,000 men and women directly, to say nothing of indirect employment in copper, glass, coal, switchboards, heavy machinery, and so forth.

The money invested, $12,600,000,000, is owned directly by from five to ten million investors. At four to a family, there are from twenty to forty million people who derive a part of their support from this industry. This is an average of from 46,000 to 92,000 people in the home districts of the Members of this House.

In addition to direct owners let us consider those who are indirectly the owners of the industry. Among them are those whose savings have gone into life insurance. Counting ordinary, industrial, group, and fraternal insurance, it is estimated that there are 65,000,000 separate individuals whose lives are insured to provide for their old age, or for wife and children when they are gone. This is nearly twice as many as ever voted in a Presidential election. Total insurance on these lives exceeds $105,000,000,000, an average per life insured of $1,600. Nine percent of the assets of the companies to pay these policies when they mature is invested in utility securities. In other words, for every $10 paid in premiums 90 cents is invested in this industry.

In addition to life insurance there are fire, windstorm, accident, health, automobile, and casualty companies; savings banks, with millions of depositors; hospitals, colleges, churches, charities, and so forth, whose assets are invested in this industry.

The bill, therefore, affects the welfare and property of at least 65,000,000 people, directly or indirectly, and the millions more of persons dependent upon them. This is an average of at least 150,000 in every congressional district.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT FOR THE EXISTING SITUATION

Government, State and Federal, is itself directly responsible for holding companies. This seems to me to be an additional reason for giving this bill the most conscientious examination possible. The crooks in the industry are not alone at fault. Government is itself at fault. Because of that fact we should be particularly careful with respect to rights of innocent people who invested their savings not only with the consent, but almost at the invitation of their own Government. Why do I say that?

First. What is a holding company? It is a corporation that owns stock in another corporation. At common law this was not permitted. But by action of the State legislatures of all or nearly every State in the Union the rule was changed. The States therefore created the situation in which the investment was made. If holding companies are inimical to our institutions (and many of them are)—the States and Nation, in fairness, should have discovered that fact many years ago. We do not have, therefore, a white sheet of paper to write upon. We have instead a tangled skein, woven in part by Government itself.

Second. Many States have expressly authorized, and, therefore, invited investments in utility securities to be made by banks, insurance companies, and trustees.

Third. Many States forbid a corporation chartered in another State from exercising in the first State the right of eminent domain to acquire land for corporate purposes. As an example, a natural-gas pipe line running from the Texas Panhandle to St. Paul or Chicago. Although the pipe line is an economic unit, several local State corporations are required to be created, whose stock in turn must be held by a holding company in order to have unified management and to attract investment. The legal situation in such case makes a holding company inevitable if the people of Texas are to have a market for their gas and the people of Chicago are to have cheap fuel.

Fourth. Many States exempt their own citizens from taxation on stocks and bonds of corporations chartered by such State. This again invites the creation of holding companies in order to get the advantages of low-cost capital by local investors in local companies which may be part of a holding company system, such as the pipe line referred to.

Fifth. When the Federal Government permitted consolidated corporation income-tax returns to be made it encouraged the creation and growth of holding companies. This has been corrected, in part at least, by recent legislation.

Sixth. The Federal Government is again responsible by reason of its action, following the World War, in repealing the income-tax law on intercorporate dividends; that is, tax on dividends received by one corporation from another. This again encouraged the development of holding companies, direct and intermediate.

We have therefore a situation which Government has itself permitted and encouraged. In that situation the rights of millions of innocent people have become inextricably interwoven. Because of that fact it weighs upon my conscience to be far more careful in dealing with this situation than if Government, State and Federal, were in no way responsible. Our people ought not, by our action, to feel that they have been unjustly dealt with by their own Government. Or, as Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes once said, "We have to choose, and, for my part, I think it a less evil that some criminals should escape than that the Government should play an ignoble part."

I do not, of course, contend that the action or nonaction of former legislatures or Congresses should estop a later Congress from dealing with serious abuses which have grown up under the aegis and protection of Government. I merely contend that in such case one should be especially vigilant to be just.

This is a long preface to an examination of the constitutional questions involved. It is made only to justify the care with which that examination should be made.

In this discussion I confine myself to title 1 of the Senate bill, and particularly the "death sentence", to be found in section 11. Important questions are involved in other titles of the bill, but I have not had time to examine them.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO DEAL WITH THE SUBJECT MATTER OF THE BILL

The power of Congress to act in this matter in any way whatever is to be found in only three sentences of the Constitution, the power "to establish post offices and post roads", the power "to regulate commerce among the several States", and to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." Assuming that the holding companies are solvent the constitutional power "on the subject of bankruptcies" does not seem to be involved.

The express limitations upon those powers are two paragraphs in the Bill of Rights, the fifth amendment:

> No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

And the tenth amendment:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

WHAT WE HAVE TO DEAL WITH

As a typical situation, we have a corporation lawfully organized and deriving its powers from one of the sovereign States of the Union to which—

> Powers not delegated to the United States * * * are reserved.

The company has bought stock in another company as it is legally authorized to do. The company is solvent. Its securities have been sold in interstate commerce. It uses the mail, telegraphy, telephone, and express across State lines in the conduct of its business. Its business is management. It is not itself engaged in generating, transmitting, distributing, or selling electric current or gas. That business is done by the company whose stock it owns. It sells nothing to the public except its securities. Its management of the company it owns consists in furnishing it with legal, insurance, purchasing, financing, engineering, and managerial service. When these charges are excessive the lower company is "milked." Sometime it owns a subsidiary which engages in constructing power plants, transmission lines, and so forth.

The company which it owns produces and sells electric current to the public. Some of that current crosses State lines. The rates charged to the public by the owned company are regulated by a commission in the State in which it sells. Its securities are often subject to State "blue sky" laws.

Sometimes the holding company owns many such operating companies in its own or other States. Sometimes this ownership by the "top" company of the operating companies is through a chain of intermediate holding companies, perhaps as much as 10 "stories high." This permits "pyramiding" of control, with a minimum of investment at the top, through such devices as no-par voting stock sold at $1 or $5 or nothing a share.

The evils which have grown up in this situation have no defender in me. On another occasion I shall discuss them and what I think can and should be done by Congress to prevent their future occurrence. For the present I limit myself to the constitutional question.

QUERIES

In such typical situation we have first to ask these simple questions:

First. Is the holding company engaged in interstate commerce?

Second. If so, does the bill go beyond the regulation of the holding company's interstate business and into other matters "reserved to the States"?

Third. Can Congress require the holding company to divest itself of the ownership of the stock of some or all of its operating companies?

Fourth. Can Congress permit the company to continue to own those stocks but require that it shall not vote the stock it owns?

Fifth. Can Congress force the company to go out of business, force it into receivership, and require it to pay its debts, distribute its assets to its security holders, and surrender its charter? This is the "death sentence."

Sixth. Does the bill attempt to confer upon the Commission an unlawful delegation of congressional power, as in the Schechter "sick chicken" case?

Seventh. What is the force of the fact that the company uses the instrumentalities of interstate commerce and the United States mail? Can Congress forbid such use or grant it only on condition that the company agrees to do as Congress says?

Eighth. If Congress can regulate such company in some respects, does the bill go beyond what is "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the power to regulate, and thus enter the jurisdiction "reserved to the States, respectively"?

Ninth. In regulating the company, does the bill go so far as to be unreasonable and arbitrary and thus amount to a deprivation of liberty or property to the company or to its stockholders, in violation of the fifth amendment, which provides that such property cannot be taken except on due process of law or without just compensation?

Tenth. Does the ownership of stock in a corporation chartered in another State make the owner one who is engaged in interstate commerce?

No hedgehog bristles with more spines than this bill does with law questions, but the above are the principal ones.

All these questions are answered in favor of the bill by the two young gentlemen who wrote the bill, Mr. Ben Cohen and Mr. Tom Corcoran. Their brief will be found at page 807 of the Senate hearings. It is also to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 29, page 8402. I invite your attention to it. It is an exceedingly able, though attenuated, argument. I disagree with it in toto.

A STAR TO STEER BY

It is clear that in regulating commerce Congress cannot go beyond what is necessary and proper for carrying into execution the power to regulate. Congress can regulate the shipment interstate commerce of diceased chickens. But can it regulate the number of hours the chicken shall scratch? No; because the power to regulate hours of work is not necessary and proper to regulate the shipment of the chickens, and also because that power is reserved to the States. The fifth and tenth amendments did not overlook the hen that lays the egg.

When the law plays its last card, it is plain common sense. It is not common sense to burn the barn to kill the rats. It is also the law that government cannot burn the barn unless "necessary and proper" to kill the rats. If potassium cyanide will do the job, that is as far as the law can go.

All this is "elementary, my dear Watson; elementary." From now on we cannot avoid a more technical discussion.

In Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton Railroad Co., decided last month, the Supreme Court said:

> When the question is whether legislative action transcends the limits of due process guaranteed by the Constitution, decision is guided by the principle that the law should not be unreasonable, arbitrary, or capricious, and that the means selected shall have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained (i. e., the regulation of interstate commerce).

Throughout the consideration of the question one cannot go wrong if he keeps constantly in mind the language of the Supreme Court in the Employers' Liability cases (207 U. S. 463), as follows:

> It remains only to consider the contention which we have previously quoted, that the act is constitutional, although it embraces subjects not within the power of Congress to regulate commerce, because one who engages in interstate commerce thereby submits all his business concerns to the regulating power of Congress. To state the proposition is to refute it. It assumes that because one engages in interstate commerce he thereby endows Congress with power not delegated to it by the Constitution, in other words, with the right to legislate concerning matters of purely State concern. It rests upon the conception that the Constitution destroyed that freedom of commerce which it was its purpose to preserve, since it treats the right to engage in interstate commerce as a privilege which cannot be availed of except upon such conditions as Congress may prescribe, even although the conditions would be otherwise beyond the power of Congress. It is apparent that if the contention were well founded it would extend the power of Congress to every conceivable subject, however inherently local, would obliterate all the limitations of power imposed by the Constitution, and would destroy the authority of the States as to all conceivable matters which from the beginning have been and must continue to be under their control so long as the Constitution endures.
> Concluding, as we do, that the statute, whilst it embraces subjects within the authority of Congress to regulate commerce, also includes subjects not within its constitutional power, and that the two are so interblended in the statute that they are incapable of separation, we are of the opinion that the courts below rightly held the statute to be repugnant to the Constitution and nonenforceable.

WHAT THE DEATH SENTENCE DOES

The "death sentence", section 11 of Senate bill, requires—> each registered holding company and each subsidiary company (sic) thereof to divest itself of any interest in or control over property or persons (which includes corporations) to such an extent or the Commission (Securities Exchange Commission) finds necessary * * * to limit the operations of the holding-company system, of which such company is a part, to a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system.

It further provides that each such company—> be reorganized or dissolved, whenever the Commission finds that the corporate structure or continued existence of such company unduly or unnecessarily complicates the structure of the holding-company system of which it is a part, or unfairly or inequitably distributes voting power among the holders of securities, or is detrimental to the proper functioning of a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system.

[NOTE.—The words which I have placed in italics are not defined in the bill. They raise the whole question of legislative standards to guide administrative action. What does Congress mean by "a single geographically and economically integrated system"? When is a corporate structure "unduly" or "unnecessarily" complicated? Under what circumstances is voting power "unfairly" or "inequitably" distributed? What is the "proper" functioning of a utility system?]

After January 1, 1940, all registered holding companies beyond the "first degree" must cease to be such by giving up their assets or control, or by dissolution and winding up their affairs. Holding companies in the first degree shall be permitted to continue upon "such terms and conditions as the Commission—Securities Exchange Commission—may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers", and second, "if" the Federal Power Commission certifies that the "continuance of the holding company relation is necessary, under the applicable State or foreign law, for the operations of a geographically and economically integrated system serving an economic region in a single State or extending into two or more contiguous States or into a contiguous foreign country."

That is the "death sentence." It is mandatory upon all holding companies beyond the first degree.

It is broadly stated that holding companies in the first degree are to survive the date of execution. But it is manifest that before its fate is known it must first come within the "terms and conditions"—whatever they may be—of the Securities Exchange Commission, and second, secure a commutation of sentence from the Federal Power Commission which decides how much of its property must be whittled off to come within the Commission's ideas of a "geographically and economically integrated system serving an economic area"—whatever that is.

It can be plainly stated, therefore, that no utility holding company in the United States, even in the first degree, can know whether it will be permitted to live after 1940, or how much of its property it must surrender as a condition to live.

Such is the sentence under which this great business must live for the next 5 years.

OPERATING COMPANIES ALSO UNDER DEATH SENTENCE

It is commonly supposed that the "death sentence" may be imposed only on holding companies. This is an error. It may be imposed also on "subsidiary companies" which are defined as companies 10 percent or more of whose voting securities are owned or controlled by a holding company. In fact, a company less than 10 percent of whose voting stock is controlled by a holding company, may be declared to be a "subsidiary company" if found "necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers." See section 2 (8).

It is plain, therefore, that in addition to holding companies any operating company in the United States (if 10 percent of its stock is owned by a holding company) may be directed to divest itself of part or all of its property or be dissolved and its affairs wound up, if such action is found "necessary or appropriate" to limit the operations of the system of which it is a part to a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system, or if such operating company "unduly or unnecessarily complicates the structure of the system of which it is a part", or "unfairly and inequitably distributes voting power", and so forth.

The bill therefore is directed against practically every operating company in the Nation as well as holding companies. As to the wisdom of this it may be said that seldom, if ever, would the act be directed against operating companies. But I am not now speaking of its wisdom. I am speaking of the power. And if this be a "permitted object of Federal control, the extent of the regulation * * * would be a question of discretion and not of power" (Hughes, Chief Justice, in the Schechter case).

The operating company may be guilty of none of the evils set forth in the preamble of the bill. Nevertheless, it may be required to part with its property or go into liquidation. Its voting power may be redistributed. It is no avail that such voting power is distributed among its security holders as provided by the law of the sovereign State which created it. If, in the judgment of the Commission, such voting power is "unfairly or inequitably" distributed the company shall be reorganized or dissolved. The Commission may thus veto the act of the legislature of the State of its creation, and may deprive a security holder of the operating company of the right to vote his stock in accordance with State law, and thus deprive him, in part, of the power to determine the management of the company in which he has invested his money in reliance upon State law. The only offense of the operating company may be that it "unduly or unnecessarily" complicates the system of which it is a part, or is not a part of a geographically integrated system. But that offense is nevertheless punishable by dismemberment or dissolution.

One does not need to be long out of law school to recognize that all this raises questions of profound importance.

Let us suppose a simple case. An operating company is lawfully organized under State law. It is locally owned, operated, and managed. It is not physically connected with another electric system. It has a charter life of say 100 years. John Citizen buys some of its voting stock. He knows his investment is subject to the hazards of business. But except for those hazards he believes his investment is good for 100 years, the life of the charter.

But the company grows. It buys other properties. And worst of all, some of John Citizen's wicked neighbors, even against his will, sell their stock to another company. That company acquires 10 percent of the voting stock of the first. John Citizen's company is now through no fault of his a subsidiary company which unnecessarily complicates the system of which it is a part. Or it is found that John Citizen must give up some of his voting power to bondholders who had no such right when John Citizen made his investment, or when they made theirs.

For all or any of these sundry and heinous offenses John Citizen may be compelled to accept a stock different from the one he purchased, may see its voting control pass into other hands, or see his company compelled to sell property in which he as stockholder has an interest, or, finally, see his company completely reorganized or dissolved, although neither he nor it has committed any offense under the laws of the State of its creation or operation.

This is an extreme example of the powers conferred by the bill. One must be deeply concerned upon the effect of all these many uncertainties upon investments not only in holding companies but operating companies as well.

All this is brought under the interstate-commerce clause of the Federal Constitution on the theory, as maintained by Senator WHEELER, that the operating company is engaged in interstate commerce—although its operations are entirely intrastate—because, and only because, it is controlled by a holding company which in turn is engaged (?) in interstate commerce. This is the house that Jack built.

HOW FAR CAN CONGRESS GO?

Does the Constitution of the United States grant Congress the power to do these things as "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" its power to "regulate commerce * * * among the several States"? Again let me say I am discussing power, not evils. I am personally persuaded that "competitive charter mongering" by the States, notably Delaware, when the race has been one of laxity, not of diligence, has grown to be a great evil. I am persuaded that the concentration of control and dilution of investment under these charters has become a great evil. Still the question remains to what extent the Federal Government has the power to correct these evils, and if so, how far, and in what way, the power should be exercised.

First, the question of the delegation of legislative power, without adequate standards, to the Commission as set forth in section 11 of the Senate bill.

When does the "corporate structure" or "continued existence" of one company "unduly or unnecessarily complicate the structure" of another company which owns 10 percent of the stock of the first? Who can say? When is voting power "unfairly or inequitably distributed"? One would think that the determination of that question by the legislature of the State of the company's charter, as adopted by the organizers and investors in the company so organized would be final and conclusive. But no, the Commission may compel some other arrangement on the theory that what a sovereign State has authorized to be done is "unfair" and "inequitable." It may change the contract between the investor and the company. It may rewrite the charter to fit its own conception of equity. What will that be? No one knows and Congress does not tell.

Shall bondholders vote equally with common stock? If so, the bondholders might determine that with their senior position they would come out whole and vote to dissolve or sell the corporation at a price that would yield the common-stock holders nothing, even though the company is solvent and not in default in interest or dividends. Shall the preferred vote equally with the common stock? If so, shall that equality be share for share or dollar for dollar of original investment? Shall a common stock issued at $5 have an equal voice with a preferred stock issued at $100, or shall it have only one-twentieth of a vote? What is "equity" here? Congress does not say. If preferred stock originally issued at $100 is resold for $50, does the last buyer have a whole vote or a half vote? Congress does not say.

What is a "geographically and economically integrated public-utility system"? Take the geographical concept first. Take New England or Florida or Michigan. Does it mean a system in that geographical area entirely owned by one company, or would it be "geographically integrated" if there were several systems in the territory, all interconnected and exchanging power with each other? Would railroads, differently owned, be "geographically integrated" in that territory if they all exchanged their services to serve the people who lived there?

What is an "economically integrated system"? Economically for whom—the consumer or the investor, the buyer or the seller? Their interests are opposite. One wants cheap rates. The other wants dividends and security. To the consumer the system is economically integrated if it is well managed and produces cheaply, whether the system has other properties in other States or not. To the investor it may be "economically integrated" if there are many properties, widely scattered but centrally managed. To him diversification of risk may be a prime objective, and he might prefer to own stock in a system with properties widely separated, so that his dollar will not be entirely at the hazard of Florida hurricane, San Francisco earthquake, T. V. A. or economic depression in our locality.

It seems clear that section 11 over and over again runs foul of the principle laid down by the Supreme Court in the Schechter and Panama—"hot oil"—cases. There the Court discussed "fair competition" as we are here concerned, among other questions, with an "unfair" distribution of voting power. The Court asked whether "fair competition" is a category established in the law" or whether it was a "convenient designation" of whatever may be deemed to be "wise and beneficent" in which one "may roam at will." Or, as Justice Cardozo said, "Here, in effect, is a roving commission to inquire into evils and upon discovery correct them."

Other difficulties suggest themselves. Suppose an "unfair" distribution of voting power, if you can define it, or an "unnecessary complication" of corporate structure. Does it "directly" or "indirectly" affect commerce?

> Where the effect of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce is merely indirect, such transactions remain within the domain of State power" (Schechter case).

Does the distribution of voting power directly affect—indeed, can it have any effect upon the free flow of electric energy across State lines? Can you impede voltage with an "unfair" stock certificate?

Another question is this: The bill assumes that "service management, construction, and other contracts involve the allocation of charges among subsidiary companies" and may result in "excessive charges" to operating companies. I believe this is often true. I believe that in many cases such charges have been grossly excessive and difficult to run down. Still the question remains whether this is a matter for State or Federal action.

The charges made by holding companies for management, and so forth, is one of the bases for action to "make such company cease to be a holding company." How does this square with the Schechter case? There it was argued by the Government that "hours and wages affect prices." The court said, "If the Federal Government may determine the wages and hours of employees in the internal commerce of a State, because of their relation to cost and prices and their indirect effect upon interstate commerce, it would seem that a similar control might be exerted over other elements of cost, also affecting prices, such as the number of employees, rents, advertising, methods of doing business, etc." And Justice Cardozo said, "Activities local in their immediacy do not become interstate and national because of distant repercussions."

The quoted language refers to a situation by no means the same as that involved here. But let us analyze it. Here is an operating company wholly within one State, Texas, for example. It does not transmit electrical energy across State lines, either as buyers or sellers. Ten percent or more of its stock is owned by a holding company located in New York. The latter performs engineering or tax or legal services for the former. Let us say the charge is too much. It is "milking" the operating company. In the first place the utility commission of the State where the operating company is located ought to disallow the excess charge, as the Supreme Court says it may do. But suppose the State fails in its duty and the excess charge affects the price paid by the consumers, none of whom live outside the State. Is the service charge in such case a burden on interstate commerce merely because the holding company is located in New York, and all that crosses State lines are letters, a legal opinion, for example, by which the service is rendered by one company to the other?

Is it not clear that these matters only indirectly affect interstate commerce, if at all, and are as certain to be held unconstitutional as hours of wages in the Schechter case or railroad pensions in the Railroad Retirement Act case, both decided within the past month as beyond the power of Congress and within the reserved power of the States? And yet the destruction of the property rights of American citizens and the dissolution of both holding and operating companies are predicated upon these ingenious attenuations.

To the law officers of the Government who may be called upon to defend this bill before the United States Supreme Court, I extend my sympathy and condolences. As they march by the Halls of Congress on their way to the Supreme Court I can hear them mutter the despairing words of the Roman arena, "Morituri, salutamus te"—"We who are about to die, salute thee."

In passing it may be pointed out that if the Senate bill becomes law, it will be the first time in the constitutional history of this Republic where Congress has, by legislative fiat, presumed to order the dissolution of a corporation created under the authority of the laws of a sovereign State.

BRIEF

The foregoing only scratches the surface of the subject. I have stated it in the simplest possible terms. I know lawyer colleagues will wish to examine the question more critically, and I therefore attach a study of the cases.

SUPPORTING MEMORANDUM

Is the holding company engaged in interstate commerce? If so, it must be because (a) it owns stock in other companies, or (b) its business of management by United States mail, and so forth, is interstate commerce, or (c) it sells its securities in interstate commerce. Granting that any or all of these constitute commerce, the question still remains whether this fact warrants Congress in governing other of its activities as the bill attempts to do, or in destroying the company.

DOES OWNERSHIP OF STOCK CONSTITUTE COMMERCE?

Mere ownership of a mathematical percentage of voting stock is supposed to furnish a basis for Federal control. In fact, ownership is not required. Any person, an individual, may be held to be a "holding company" if he is found to "exercise a controlling influence." This is the first time the "regulation of commerce among the States" has been predicated on such a base. Even companies "not so engaged" (in interstate commerce) are brought within the bill. See section 15 (b).

Ownership of stock, even by a holding company, does not per se constitute the owner as engaged in the business of the corporation whose stock is owned (Cannon Mfg. Co. v. Cudahy Co., 267 U. S. 333; Peterson v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co., 205 U. S. 364).

The Northern Securities case (193 U. S. 197), both in the majority and minority opinions, shows that the rule of nonidentity between stockholder and corporation is fully recognized. In the dissenting opinion Mr. Chief Justice White, pages 369 and 370, wrote:

> Does the delegation of authority to Congress to regulate commerce among the States embrace the power to regulate the ownership of stock in State corporations, because such corporations may be in part engaged in interstate commerce? Certainly not, if such question is to be governed by the definition of commerce just quoted from Gibbons v. Ogden. Let me analyze the definition. "Commerce undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse"; that is, traffic between the States and intercourse between the States. I think the ownership of stock in a State corporation cannot be said to be in any sense traffic between the States or intercourse between them.
> But the principle that the ownership of property is embraced within the power of Congress to regulate commerce whenever that body deems that a particular character of ownership, if allowed to continue, may restrain commerce between the States or create a monopoly thereof, is in my opinion in conflict with the most elementary conceptions of rights of property.

The majority opinion did not controvert this statement by the Chief Justice. It held that the question was not involved. The Court said—page 334:

> In this connection it is suggested that the contention of the Government is that the acquisition and ownership of stock in a State railroad corporation is itself interstate commerce, if that corporation be engaged in interstate commerce. * * * Such statements as to the issues in this case are, we think, wholly unwarranted and are very wide of the mark; it is the setting up of mere men of straw to be easily stricken down. We do not understand that the Government makes any such contentions or takes any such positions as those statements imply. It does not contend that Congress may control the mere acquisition or the mere ownership of stock in a State corporation engaged in interstate commerce. Nor does it contend that Congress can control the organization of State corporations authorized by their charters to engage in interstate and international commerce.

In Pullman Car Co. v. Missouri Pacific Co. (115 U. S. 587), the Court held that ownership by the Missouri Pacific of substantially all of the stock in another company did not constitute control of the latter.

Stock ownership does not constitute interstate commerce, nor does it justify the treatment of the owner as if he were engaged in the activities of the company whose stock it owns (United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co. (213 U. S. 366); United States v. Lehigh R. R. Co. (220 U. S. 357); United States v. Reading Co. (253 U. S. 56); New Hampshire Gas, Steam & Electric Co. v. Morse (42 Fed. (2d) 490); Toledo Traction, Light & Power Co. v. Smith (205 Fed. 643); United States v. Union Stockyard & Transit Co. (192 Fed. 330); Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co. (282 U. S. 133)).

A negative answer must therefore be given to the question whether stock ownership constitutes the owner as engaging in the business—interstate or intrastate—of the corporation whose stock is owned. Only a tortuous ratiocination could conceive of a person in the District of Columbia who owns 10 percent of the stock of a public utility in San Francisco as engaged in interstate commerce.

DOES THE BUSINESS OF A HOLDING COMPANY CONSTITUTE INTERSTATE COMMERCE?

Service, sales, and construction contracts are not interstate commerce, per se, even when the parties to them live in different States—which the bill does not demand—or when communication between them is maintained " by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise "—as the bill recites. Contracts for advisory and other services are not interstate commerce (Diamond Glue Co. v. United States Glue Co., 187 U. S. 611; United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. of Baltimore v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 231 U. S. 394). Nor are contracts for construction (Kansas City Steel Co. v. Arkansas, 269 U. S. 148; General Railway Signal Co. v. Virginia, 246 U. S. 500; Browning v. Waycross, 233 U. S. 16); and sales may or may not involve interstate commerce, according as they do or do not involve the transmission from State to State of the articles sold (Dahnke-Walker Co. v. Bondurant, 257 U. S. 282; Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co., 258 U. S. 50; Moore v. New York Cotton Exchange, 270 U. S. 593). Borrowing and lending even between a principal and a subsidiary certainly do not constitute interstate commerce between them, and, if subject to regulation, it can only be on some theory apart from the nature of the acts themselves. (See Graniteville Mfg. Co. v. Query, 283 U. S. 376; Engel v. O'Malley, 219 U. S. 128.)

Insurance, the buying and selling of bills of exchange, the operation of an advertising agency, the reporting of credit standing, the buying and selling of cotton-future contracts, the dealing in negotiable notes have all been held not to constitute commerce (Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall. 168), New York Life Insurance Co. v. Cravens (178 U. S. 389), New York Life Insurance Co. v. Deer Lodge County (231 U. S. 495), Nathan v. Louisiana (8 How. 73), Engel v. O'Malley (219 U. S. 128), Blumenstock Bros. v. Curtis Publishing Co. (252 U. S. 436), United States Fidelity Co. v. Kentucky (231 U. S. 394), Hemphill v. Orloff (277 U. S. 537), Moore v. New York Cotton Exchange (270 U. S. 593), Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S. 405)).

As against this formidable array of decision, Messrs. Cohen and Corcoran rely on practically one case on the point in question, Federal Trade Commission v. Smith (1 Fed. Sup. 247). A careful reading of that opinion shows that it does not support them. In fact it leads very clearly to an opposite conclusion in harmony with the rule laid down by the cases cited above.

To begin with, the case involved investigation, not regulation nor destruction. The Federal Trade Commission was seeking information. The case must be read in the light, first, of the fact that the respondent Electric Bond & Share Co., was engaged in the business of purchasing and selling to its subsidiary companies in interstate shipment of materials, apparatus, and supplies, that is, physical property, and, second, in the light of the well-established rule that charges made by a holding company to a subsidiary public utility company are relevant to an investigation into the reasonableness of rates charged by the subsidiary utilities, as laid down by the Supreme Court in Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co. (282 U. S. 133) and Western Distributing Co. v. Public Service Commission (285 U. S. 119). In such case the company subject to Federal regulation is the utility company (if it transmits power over State lines) and not the holding company. The latter may be investigated as a corollary of the regulation of the former.

Except, therefore, as the Electric Bond & Share Co. engaged in shipping physical goods, the case is not authority to the proposition that its business of management was interstate commerce. The Court very clearly held the contrary in these words:

> From what has been made to appear to the Court, it is plain that the services performed by respondent on behalf of the holding and subsidiary operating companies, and which, broadly speaking, relate to legal, engineering, secretarial, fiscal, investigatory, and general advisory matters are not such as will here avail the petitioner. Without analyzing the services rendered by respondent within the foregoing classifications I shall content myself by concluding that they have to do with activities which, under authoritative decisions, are not recognized as constituting interstate commerce.

EFFECT, IF ANY, OF USE OF MAILS

The contention is made that because the holding company uses the United States mails the Federal Government may regulate all of its business, not simply its mail business. In other words, it is argued that as a condition to the right to use the mails a company may be required to subject all its business to Federal regulation, and failing to agree to Uncle Sam's terms, may be denied the use of the mails.

The answer to the startling contention is " No."

In Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan (229 U. S. 288) the Court upheld the power of Congress to classify mail matter, but referring to a contention of the Government that the postal power included an absolute right of selection of matters to be carried in the mails the Court said:

> We do not wish even by the remotest implication to be regarded as assenting to the broad contentions concerning the existence of arbitrary power through the classification of the mails.

In New York Life Insurance Co. v. Deer Lodge County (231 U. S. 495), the Court held that the mere use of the mails did not convert a local business into interstate commerce, saying " that they may live in different States and hence use the mails for their communications does not give character to what they do; * * *."

The postal power is circumscribed not only by its inherent limitations but by all other limitations in the Constitution (Public Clearing House v. Coyne (194 U. S. 497), Burton v. United States (202 U. S. 344), Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan (229 U. S. 288).

Among those limitations are the right to engage in lawful business which is a property right under the fifth amendment, the guaranty against unreasonable searches and seizures and the protection of the freedom of the press.

In Ex parte Jackson (96 U. S. 727), the leading case on the power of Congress to regulate mails, the Court said:

> The difficulty attending the subject arises, not from the want of power in Congress to prescribe regulations as to what shall constitute mail matter, but from the necessity of enforcing them consistently with rights reserved to the people, of far greater importance than the transportation of the mail.

It is apparent that if the power of Congress with respect to the mails is of the absolute and arbitrary character used as a foundation for Federal jurisdiction in the writing of this bill then the same device can be used to bring all business whatsoever under congressional control and thus use the Great Charter of our liberties as the warrant for their destruction.

> Oh, judgment, thou art fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason!

Congress thus could do by indirection what it is forbidden to do directly, and all other guarantees of freedom would be " writ on water and carved on sand." The fifth and the tenth amendments reserving all powers not granted to the central Government to the " States, respectively, or to the people " would be as though they had never been.

We are asked to believe such balderdash in the very teeth of the language of the Supreme Court in Lewis Publishing

Co. v. Morgan (229 U. S. 288), cited above, where Chief Justice White denied the assumption—

> * * * That there was a right to compel obedience to the command of legislation having that object in view, to deprive one who refused to obey of all right to use the mail service.

We are asked to believe it, also, in the teeth of the unanimous decision in the Schechter case, where the Court said:

> If the commerce clause were construed to reach all enterprises and transactions which could be said to have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, the Federal authority would embrace practically all the activities of the people, and the authority of the State over its domestic concerns would exist only by sufferance of the Federal Government.

Mr. Justice Cardozo, in his concurring opinion, expressed the same view, as follows:

> What is near and what is distant may at times be uncertain. Compare Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1). There is no penumbra of uncertainty obscuring judgment here. To find immediacy or directness here is to find it almost everywhere. If centripetal forces are to be isolated to the exclusion of the forces that oppose and counteract them, there will be an end to our Federal system.

Reference has been made to International Textbook Co. v. Pigg (217 U. S. 91), where it was held that a correspondence school in Pennsylvania was engaged in interstate commerce and could not be required by Kansas to take out a license to do business in that State. But, as stated in N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Deer Lodge County (231 U. S. 495), the Pigg case involved the transportation of property, books, and so forth, and not the rendition of services.

Even the use of instrumentalities of interstate commerce for the transportation of persons and paraphernalia does not turn a business, essentially local in character, into interstate commerce (Federal Baseball Club v. National League, 259 U. S. 200).

Having demonstrated that neither ownership of corporate stock nor the use of the mails or other instrumentalities of interstate commerce in the rendition of services gives Congress power—except investigatory, as apparently held in Federal Trade Commission against Smith—over holding companies in the typical case we have left for consideration, the cases relied on by the proponents of the bill with respect to congressional power over trusts and monopolies in restraint of trade.

CASES RELIED ON BY THE PROPONENTS

These are principally the cases of Standard Oil (221 U. S. 1), American Tobacco (221 U. S. 106), Northern Securities (193 U. S. 197), U. S. v. Reading Co. (253 U. S. 26; U. S. v. Delaware & Hudson (213 U. S. 366).

These cases involved either direct combinations or monopolies in restraint of trade or in violation of the "commodities clause" in the Hepburn Act of 1906, forbidding a railroad to carry coal in interstate commerce except for its own use. In none of those cases was there a congressional ukase to a State corporation to go out of business entirely or cease to exercise lawful powers. Congress simply forbade the doing of unlawful things; that is, restrain commerce or engage in monopoly. The dissolution and dismemberment of the corporations were enjoined to be done by the courts, and not by Congress, and only then as inevitably necessary to effect a discontinuance of the unlawful acts, because the offending corporations were created for the express purpose of doing under corporate power the things which Congress forbade which did directly affect interstate commerce.

At the very threshold, therefore, it is seen that this bill goes far beyond these cases in that the bill calls for the destruction of corporations and property rights enjoyed by their stockholders, even with respect to lawful matters.

In passing it may be noted that so far as the hearings have disclosed, none of the corporations against whom the bill is directed have ever been prosecuted by the United States as being unlawful trusts or monopolies. They are now to be destroyed ex post facto.

If the United States has been negligent and if the corporations are engaged in monopoly or restraint of trade, the convincing and conclusive answer is that power to stop such unlawful practices is already possessed by the Department of Justice, and has been in its possession during the entire 45 years since the Sherman Antitrust Act was passed. The failure of the proponents to invoke the antitrust act is a tacit admission that the corporations have not violated it, and instead have been and are doing other acts which should be stopped, even by destroying the corporation.

But where does such power reside in Congress unless such other acts directly affect interstate commerce?

Cases involving the Sherman Antitrust Act are cases of direct interference with interstate commerce through the creation of a monopoly and the suppression of competition. Neither the legislation of Congress nor the decisions of the courts go beyond what is necessary to free interstate commerce from unlawful interference with free competition. There is no justification in the decisions under the Sherman Antitrust Act—or, in fact, elsewhere—for the proposition that Congress may regulate the entire business of an individual or corporation, both interstate and intrastate, because it may have entered into a contract in restraint of interstate commerce.

In Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U. S. 197) Mr. Justice Harlan, writing the opinion of the Court, pointed out, at page 334, that the Government did not contend that Congress might control the acquisition or ownership of stock in a State corporation engaged in interstate commerce. The Northern Securities Co. was ordered to dispose of the stocks of the Northern Pacific Railway Co. and the Great Northern Railway Co. not on the ground that the Northern Securities Co. was itself engaged in interstate commerce, but on the ground that it was a device to eliminate competition between the two railway companies in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Likewise, in United States v. Reading Co. (253 U. S. 26), the holding company was organized and used as a means of suppressing competition. These decisions have no relevancy to the proposed bill.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly, consistently, and unequivocally held that Congress may not regulate the intrastate activities of corporations or persons engaged in interstate commerce which do not "directly affect" interstate commerce (United States v. Chicago, M., St. P. & Pac. R. R. Co., 282 U. S. 311; Railroad Retirement Board et al. v. Alton Railroad Co., 79 L. Ed. 803); and that an act, which attempts to regulate both interstate and intrastate activities without distinction is invalid (Employers Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463; Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States).

The Antitrust Acts were passed in pursuance of the constitutional purpose that interstate commerce should be free. Thus the Sherman Act denounces every contract combination in the form of trust or otherwise or conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States or with foreign nations as well as monopolies or attempts to create a monopoly therein and precludes every device resorted to for that purpose—whether a "loose" combination in the form of contract or a "tight" combination such as a merger or a holding company. But in each case the subject matter of the restraint or monopoly must be interstate commerce, and there must be a showing of an intent to restrain it or, lacking express proof of intent, facts so clearly tending toward a restraint or monopoly as to make the inference of intent irresistible.

So much being established, where the proceeding is one in equity and not at law, the courts having jurisdiction of the parties will mold their remedy to fit the facts, as by compelling the parent company to divorce its subsidiaries and distribute their shares—as in the Standard Oil case (221 U. S. 1); or by forcing the creation of new corporations and a distribution of assets—as in the American Tobacco case (221 U. S. 108); or by restraining the voting of stock or receiving dividends on shares illegally held—as in the Northern Securities case (193 U. S. 197). These and like decrees, however, infinitely various as they are in form, do not furnish any rule by which the general power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce can be measured. They demonstrate only the flexibility and remedial scope of equity jurisdiction acting on the parties brought before it in the light of the instant facts. It by no means follows that general statutes to the same effect if passed by Congress would be found to be within its power. Indeed, it is probably true that but few of these decrees, if adopted as a statute of universal application, could stand the constitutional test.

As to the railroads, their regulation is bottomed in part upon the fact that they are post roads; but even more upon the fact that they are not only themselves engaged in commerce between the States but are the very instrumentalities by which that commerce is chiefly carried on. Control over them, as all men know, has broadened steadily, its principal objective at all times having been improved service at reasonable rates. Yet even this Federal control has its bounds. It cannot invade the intrastate field except to make effective its interstate regulation (The Shreveport case (234 U. S. 342), Minnesota Rate cases (230 U. S. 352)); it cannot under the guise of regulation usurp the powers of management (Interstate Comm. Comm. v. Chicago G. W. Ry. Co. (209 U. S. 108, 119), South Western Bell Telephone Co. v. Public Service Com. (262 U. S. 276)). It cannot supervise contracts made by railroad security holders (U. S. v. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. P. & P. R. R. Co. (282 U. S. 311); nor can it deal directly with wages and hours (Railroad Retirement Board v. Alton R. R. Co. (79 L. Ed. 803)). Whatever the outer limitations of this regulatory power may be, no one would argue that whatever Congress could impose upon an interstate railroad it could also impose upon manufacturing or trading or mining companies, or even upon holding companies and their subsidiary public-service companies doing business inside a State.

If it be urged that acts which are not interstate commerce in themselves can nevertheless be controlled by Congress where they have an effect upon such commerce, the answer is that in every such case the alleged effect must be direct and not indirect, proximate and not remote.

It has been so repeatedly held that neither the generation nor local distribution of electric energy is interstate commerce that it would seem, as day follows night, that the business of the typical company holding the stock of the local utility and in part managing its business is also not interstate commerce.

As to generation, see Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost (286 U. S. 163), where the court said:

> We are satisfied, upon a consideration of the whole case, that the process of generation is as essentially local as though electrical energy were a physical thing; and to that situation we must apply, as controlling, the general rule that commerce does not begin until manufacture is finished, and hence the commerce clause of the Constitution does not prevent the State from exercising exclusive control over the manufacture (Cornell v. Coyne, 192 U. S. 418, 428–429). Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it (United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1, 12).

As to distribution of natural gas, see East Ohio Gas Co. v. Tax Commission (283 U. S. 465), where the Supreme Court held that this was a "purely local concern exclusively within the jurisdiction of the State" and expressly overruled Pennsylvania Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (252 U. S. 23).

As to distribution of electric energy, a statutory court of three judges in South Carolina Power Co. v. Tax Commission (60 Fed. (2d) 528 (affirmed without opinion in 288 U. S. 178), held that when electric energy is brought in from without State boundaries for distribution and sale on a system of lines within the State, the interstate character ends. (See also P. U. C. v. London, 249 U. S. 236; Missouri v. Kansas Natural Gas Co., 265 U. S. 298; East Ohio Gas Co. v. Tax Commission, 283 U. S. 465.)

Transmission across State lines by a local utility is of course interstate commerce (Public Utilities Consumers v. Attleboro Steam & Electric Co., 273 U. S. 83).

In the latter case, assuming that the local company is controlled by a holding company in another State, the question whether a service fee charged by the holding company directly affects the interstate transmission seems to be in serious doubt under the decision in the Schechter and other cases with reference to prices. It is the rate charged to the consumer which is regulated, not the price charged to the utility, although the price may be looked into to determine the fairness of the rate. The Supreme Court has never shown any hunger and thirst to control prices until and unless they are in the form of rates charged to the final consumer of a business invested with a public interest. And in any event the power is to regulate, not to destroy.

We cannot pass over the further thought that because some holding companies and some operating companies have sold worthless stocks, charged excessive fees, and so forth, that therefore all companies should be proscribed for the dereliction of the few. This is not intelligent. It is not constitutional. "The life of the law is reason, and what is not reason is not law." Put all bank cashiers in prison because some embezzle!

The evidence has shown that many holding companies perform useful and lawful functions. And it is as clear as crystal that rights granted by the Federal Constitution cannot be infringed to prevent violations of law by another person. (See Schlesinger v. Wisconsin, 270 U. S. 230.)

Whatever one may think generally of holding companies and particularly of holding companies beyond "the first degree", it is certain that the Senate bill lays down no standard, guide, reason, or public policy why all holding companies beyond the first degree, regardless of any proof of wrongdoing or antisocial conduct, are to be summarily legislated out of existence, while other companies may be allowed to exist.

This is so arbitrary and capricious as to constitute a denial of due process of law under the fifth amendment. As to the companies selected for destruction the death sentence is mandatory and absolute. Not even the courts, nor uncontradicted proof that they have not engaged in any of the practices condemned in the bill's preamble, can save them. Second cousins must die; first cousins may live.

> When the question is whether legislative action transcends the limits of due process guaranteed by the fifth amendment, decision is guided by the principle that the law shall not be unreasonable, arbitrary, or capricious, and that the means selected shall have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained (Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502, 525)).

Another quaint and curious thing about section 11 is the fact that holding companies in the first degree may be permitted to live if "necessary under the applicable State law", even though such company may have committed all the crimes recited in the preamble of the bill. Congress in effect says to the Commission, "Here is a criminal corporation. Let it live if you find its continued existence necessary. Here is another corporation. Kill it, however innocent."

What lawyer can believe that this casual disposition of the property rights of innocent investors can endure for 24 hours in the Supreme Court of the United States? It ought not to endure for 1 hour in the Congress of the United States. Nor should we overlook the tenth amendment and the rights of the States.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that under the Constitution the Federal Government cannot, through taxation or otherwise, sap the sovereignty of the States, and, conversely, that the sovereignty of the Federal Government cannot be whittled away by State action. The creation and continued existence of corporations created by the several States involve the continued exercise of sovereignty. The powers and privileges granted to corporations and their continuance, their right to hold and dispose of property in accordance with their charters, depend upon this continued exercise of sovereignty. When the United States undertakes to dissolve a corporation maintained through the sovereign power of a State, there is a denial of State sovereignty and an interference with it quite as great as if the United States should undertake through taxation to destroy the right of States to create and continue the life of corporations. There is, thus, the gravest doubt whether, assuming the existence of a limited Federal jurisdiction over holding companies, their continued existence or summary destruction is within the power of Congress to control.

Under the fifth amendment private property may not be taken without due process of law, and a pertinent question is whether Congress should not pay utility owners for any loss of values if it is deemed necessary—and found constitutional—in the public interest to require solvent State corporations to wind up their affairs. This seems to have been the view of the Court in the recent case of Louisville Joint

Stock Land Bank v. Radford (Frazier-Lemke Act), where that great liberal, Justice Brandeis, wrote:

If the public interest requires and permits the taking of property of individual mortgagees in order to relieve the necessities of individual mortgagors, resort must be had to proceedings by eminent domain, so that, through taxation, the burden of the relief afforded in the public interest may be borne by the public.

Even property dedicated to a public use remains the property of its owners, subject to their management, and may not be taken without just compensation (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Oregon-Washington Railway Co., 288 U. S. 14). Compare section 3 (4) of the Interstate Commerce Act requiring reasonable compensation to be paid for the use of railroad terminal facilities (49 U. S. C., sec. 3 (4), with section 11 of this bill.

This all sums up in the words of the Supreme Court:

The power to regulate is not the power to destroy, and limitation is not confiscation (40 Railroad Commission cases, 116 U. S. 307–331).

Regulation is not prohibition. See Adams v. Turner (224 U. S. 590, 593), where the Court said:

"Because abuses may, and probably do, grow up in connection with this business is adequate reason for hedging it about by proper regulations. But this is not enough to justify destruction of one's right to follow a distinctly useful calling in an upright way. Certainly there is no profession, possibly no business, which does not offer peculiar opportunities for reprehensible practices; and as to every one of them no doubt some can be found quite ready earnestly to maintain that its suppression would be in the public interest. Skillfully directed agitation might also bring about apparent condemnation of any of them by the public. Happily for all, the fundamental guaranties of the Constitution cannot be freely submerged if and whenever some ostensible justification is advanced and the police power invoked."

The conclusion is that the "death sentence" in the Senate bill is an unconstitutional exercise of congressional power for the following reasons, among others:

First. It is arbitrary and capricious.

Second. It is a delegation of legislative power without adequate standards.

Third. It invades the reserved power of the States.

Fourth. It is doubtful if the typical holding company is engaged in interstate commerce through ownership and the exercise of business management in utility companies, and especially so if the local utilities do not transmit electrical energy over State lines.

Fifth. Granting fourth above, the power of Congress over such holding companies is the power to regulate and not the power to destroy.

Sixth. It takes private property without compensation and without due process of law.

Even if constitutional, it is not "necessary or proper" to execute the death sentence. The remedy is to be found in other appropriate methods. Among them are (a) the Sherman Antitrust Act; (b) the right to inquire as to charges made by holding companies to utility companies, as clearly laid down in Smith against Illinois Bell Telephone Co.; and (c) stringent regulations of the sale and pitiless publicity of company affairs underlying the sale of utility securities in interstate commerce. I also advocate the return to a small income tax on intercorporate dividends, such as we had during the World War; and, in addition, exemptions from stock transfer and other taxes, so that reorganization and simplification of "sausage string" holding companies can go forward without being penalized for doing something admittedly in the public interest.

I intended to limit this discussion to the legal phases only of the bill. I cannot, however, close without a brief reference to the wisdom of the bill. I cannot do this better than by giving these two quotations from a man trained in the law, a great statesman who exhausted his life in the service of his country, and one whose leadership in difficult days gave luster to the party of which I am a humble member. I refer to Woodrow Wilson.

Before the American Bar Association at Chattanooga, Tenn., he said in 1910:

Corporations do not do wrong. Individuals do wrong. You cannot punish corporations. Fines fall upon the wrong persons; more heavily upon the innocent than upon the guilty * * * upon the stockholders and the customers rather than upon the men who direct the business. If you dissolve the offending corporations, you throw great undertakings out of gear. You merely drive what you are seeking to check into other forms * * * to the infinite loss of thousands of entirely innocent persons and to the great inconvenience of society as a whole. Law can never accomplish its objects in that way. It can never bring peace or command respect by such futilities.

And in a message to Congress on January 20, 1914, as President of the United States, he uttered these words, which are fraught with meaning even now:

Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is.

For five long years, under the Senate bill, no holding company and few operating companies "can make sure just what the law is."

No bill could be better calculated to impede recovery, deflate values, and freeze uncertainty. Business cannot go forward—men cannot go back to work with a death sentence over their heads.

DEDICATION OF JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL SCHOOL AT TEANECK, N. J.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing an address that I made at the dedication of the new James Russell Lowell School at Teaneck, N. J.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered on June 14, 1935, at the dedication of the new James Russell Lowell School at Teaneck, N. J.:

It is my first and very pleasant duty to thank the board of education and you of Teaneck for the privilege of participating in the dedication exercises of this new edifice—the James Russell Lowell School.

A word of commendation is now justly appropriate. All credit is due your board of education, township officials, and your local organizations and public-spirited citizens. To your many achievements in Teaneck you have added this accomplishment.

When you were prompted to undertake the building of this school, you were confronted with a decidedly practical problem. You could not go into the market to sell your school bonds. There was no market for them. The usual method of financing a school project was not available to you. Finances necessary for the purpose were lacking.

Yet there seems always to be a practical way of doing things. I might relate an incident in the career of the great Lincoln. He was in the military service of the United States during the Black Hawk war. Although in rank a captain his military training was circumscribed, his knowledge of military terms exceedingly limited. In line of duty he found himself at the head of his troops leading his company over the country side. Suddenly he sighted a high fence directly ahead of them. He thought hard and he thought fast, but he could not, try as he did, recall any command for scaling a fence. However, he did remember the fundamentals and called them into play. Turning to his men, he gave the command "Company halt." He remembered that. And he recalled another well-known command which he gave, "Company rest." Then, while his men were resting he used his characteristic common, practical sense. Beckoning his lieutenant to him he whispered, "When you form the company again do it on the other side of the fence."

In that way Lincoln overcame his immediate problem. Like him, in your dilemma you mastered your situation.

Calling upon the Public Works Administrator for cooperation in overcoming the obstacles you encountered, you succeeded in having him deal with the matter in such a way as to gain your objective. Your good judgment in contacting the Government, with your faith in yourselves and the future, fortified by the stability of your community, resulted in a solution of your school problem.

By an act of the Seventy-third Congress, President Roosevelt was authorized to create the Administration of Public Works for the purpose, among other things, of constructing, financing, or aiding in the constructing or financing of any public-works project, including the building of schools. The Public Works Administration, of which Hon. Harold L. Ickes is the Administrator, by virtue of that act, became possessed of public-works funds made available by the Congress upon the recommendation of the President. Out of these funds came the financing of this school erected to the greater glory of education.

It is the proper function of government to lend its aid in times of stress and economic crises; to give aid to all weakening or tottering props of the economic structure. So it was that the Government set up agencies to loan to the banks and even to purchase preferred stocks in our banking and other financial and insurance institutions for their preservation; to protect the surplus and, in some cases, life earnings of our people by providing for the guaranty of their bank deposits; to refinance the homes of our home owners, giving stability to the home, which was disappearing rapidly through ever-increasing foreclosures in every section of the country; to save the farm to the farmer by extending credit where credit was due; to furnish financial aid to the railroads, agriculture, and industry; and to revive housing by guaranteeing construction and mortgage loans. All these things and others the Government did in an endeavor to solve our problems, and while there are problems still to be met, they are only problems which can and will be solved; and there was, of course, brought into being the comprehensive program of public works designed to furnish a large measure of reemployment so vital to economic recovery.

You were the very first to obtain the benefit of public-works financing for school purposes in the State of New Jersey. On November 23, 1933, the Public Works Administration allotted to your board of education to construct this school the sum of $215,000, loan and grant.

As a consequence you have constructed this new fireproof, two-story, elementary school building, with a combined auditorium and gymnasium, consisting of approximately 600,000 cubic feet. The construction, including the installation of equipment, amounted to $187,000. The number of men employed during the 11 months of construction was between 50 and 60, or a total of 56,000 man-hours at 30 hours a week. The labor expenditure amounted to $68,599, and the cost of material, involving other labor, was estimated at $108,658.

This school, a public necessity, was constructed to relieve the serious congested condition at the two elementary schools which had an enrollment in one school of 468 pupils with a normal seating capacity of 315 and in the other school an enrollment of 342 pupils with a normal seating capacity of 196. This new school has a capacity of 455 pupils, and will provide school facilities for the 300 excess enrollment of the overcrowded elementary school.

In the public-works program for the increase of educational facilities a total allotment of $5,472,000 has been made to the State of New Jersey for the construction and remodeling of 26 schools and colleges. Of this total amount there are 2 projects completed at a total cost of $311,000, 18 projects under construction at a cost of $3,722,200, and 6 projects to be placed under construction in the near future at a cost of $1,438,800. Among the latter is the new wing to the Teaneck High School, for which an allotment of $635,000, loan and grant, has been made. The bids for the construction of this high-school addition will be received during the coming week. The building of the wing will then quickly proceed for the early elimination of the overcrowded condition in the high school.

The township of Teaneck has grown by leaps and bounds. From a population of 2,082 in 1910 there has been a growth, increasing with the years, until now there is a population in excess of 20,000. There is a reason. You have created an ideal community. You have builded well. Your homes, your schools, your churches reflect the character of your people. Teaneck is becoming more and more sought by homemakers. While there was a stoppage of home building everywhere else, homes were being erected here, and are still being built and occupied.

With the increase in population, educational facilities, at first adequate, failed to meet the needs of your children. Each year brought an additional enrollment of pupils in your schools. Additional school room had to be provided if you were to discharge the duty good citizenship placed upon you. You have selected good teachers for your children—which is all important—and now you are assured of proper and ample classrooms. In effecting these things, you have not missed the aim of education, which, to me, is nothing more nor less than an endeavor to bring up the new generation according to our ideals, equipping them as well or better than we are equipped to live lives of useful occupation, of honor and integrity and of progress, partaking of and preserving the benefits of American principles and institutions.

You are to be commended, too, in so fittingly naming this school in honor of James Russell Lowell, author, poet, lawyer, diplomat, man of letters. The influence of his genius permeates every classroom of the schools of America. His works are known to every school boy and girl. A great American, he was a leader of sound political thought for which the citizens of Teaneck are noted—an attribute which you evidently desire to have imparted to your children by the very choice for this school of the name of Lowell, whose life, character, and works offer, in and of themselves, an ideal American education.

Despite the difficulties which beset us, we cannot help but feel contented in the thought that our God in Heaven looks down approvingly upon this noble undertaking for our children, and on this occasion, this June evening, we must experience a keen sense of the feeling expressed by Lowell in the Vision of Sir Launfal, in these words:

"And what is so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then Heaven tries the earth if it be in tune
And over it softly her warm ear lays."

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, on the last roll call I was listening and failed to hear my name called. If I had heard it, I would have voted "aye" for the rule.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8554) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1935, and June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLARD. I object. The face of the eagle on the mace is turned to the wall.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion on this side I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. MILLARD. I said I objected to dispensing with reading of the bill. The face of the eagle on the mace is bowed down and turned to the wall, ashamed of what the Democrats are doing.

Mr. RANKIN. I ask unanimous consent that the eagle be turned around. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

During the reading the following occurred:

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MICHENER. I make the point of order that that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued reading the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. MILLARD. I object.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that under the rules the Clerk must read slowly in well-measured tones.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued reading the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it not within the province of the Chair to compel Members who want to hear the bill read to stay in the Chamber and listen to every word that is read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair presumes that those who desire to hear the bill read will remain here.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven Members present, a quorum.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. TREADWAY. I object to any remarks being made while the Chair is counting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is not in order. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] is entitled to 1 hour and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is entitled to 1 hour.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I take this time for the purpose of calling attention to the provision in the bill for the extensions and replacements in veterans' hospitals. It is found on page 48 of the bill and page 13 of the report. The Veterans' Committee held hearings some time ago, and we had before us representatives from the veterans' organizations, and also the Director of the Veterans' Administration, General Hines.

They submitted their programs, we got them together, and the Federal Board of Hospitalization has worked out these extensions. With the exception of 1 or 2 or 3 new units, that will be necessary which are now being worked out by the Federal Board of Hospitalization, this will virtually complete our veterans' hospital program and will furnish sufficient beds to take care of the present load. This legislation was particularly necessary because of the fact that the mental cases were not only overcrowding our hospitals but many of them were without beds or room in these hospitals. I make this statement as Chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation to let Members know what the situation is.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. This increases the capacity from approximately 20,000 beds to 30,000 beds.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. I notice one provision in the State of Michigan is a matter of 164 beds at Camp Custer. We have a hospital in Detroit with 150 beds, and we have 8 more patients than beds.

Mr. RANKIN. We went into that proposition and the Federal Board of Hospitalization is working now on the Detroit proposition.

Mr. DONDERO. So that matter will still be taken care of in some way?

Mr. RANKIN. We hope so.

Mr. DONDERO. We have to send these patients out of the State of Michigan, either to Chicago or to Dayton, away from their homes for hospitalization, and we do not think it is the right thing to do.

Mr. RANKIN. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan, and I called these facts to the attention of the Federal Board of Hospitalization. I have asked them to work out something to take care of the situation in Detroit.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman is not indicating that it is in any way a hardship on the veterans to be sent to Dayton, is he?

Mr. DONDERO. I do think it is a hardship on the veterans and upon their families. That is a very fine hospital at Dayton, but these patients have to be sent there away from home.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. I introduced at the request of the American Legion a bill providing for 160 beds at American Lake Hospital. I do not find it here, and I am wondering if it received the approval of General Hines.

Mr. RANKIN. If it is not in list, it did not.

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman know whether or not any other provision outside of this is being made for it?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not, unless it is going to be a new unit. There are some things that could not be included in this bill, but will probably be taken care of later.

Mr. HOOK. May I say in regard to the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO], I have taken that matter up with the Hospitalization Board and with General Hines.

A subcommittee has been appointed with Surgeon General Cumming as chairman. They will have hearings on the Michigan situation, and I feel satisfied that the Michigan hospital situation will be taken care of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 or 3 additional minutes.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman will remember that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] introduced a bill for a new veterans' hospital in southern Illinois to take care of southern Illinois, western Kentucky, and southeastern Missouri. Does the gentleman know if any action has been taken on that matter?

Mr. RANKIN. That matter is before the Federal Board of Hospitalization now.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. Would this bill take up a question like the Nebraska hospital, where it is necessary to send some of the veterans in those hospitals in Iowa on account of overcrowding? Is there anything taken up with regard to the veterans' hospital at Lincoln, for instance, in this bill?

Mr. RANKIN. Is that a neuropsychiatric hospital?

Mr. STEFAN. I think it is.

Mr. RANKIN. If it is, these allocations are supposed to provide for that load.

Mr. STEFAN. They are not sending these men any great distance, are they?

Mr. RANKIN. I think not.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. THOM. These new units that are in contemplation are intended for mental cases, are they not?

Mr. RANKIN. I think possibly there are one or two of them contemplated that are general hospitals. For instance, there is one colored hospital to be constructed. The colored hospitals are overcrowded, and we are asking for an additional hospital for negro patients.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will state for the information of the gentleman that 7,000 of 11,000 beds are intended for mental cases.

Mr. RANKIN. That is true. These mental cases must be provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has again expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Manifestly it is not possible to review this bill in 15 minutes, so I am going to touch the high spots only.

The total Budget estimates before the committee for consideration amounted to $356,665,601.80. Your committee conducted a searching investigation into every item with a view to applying the pruning knife wherever efficient administration could be procured with a less amount. As a result, we allowed $224,477,561.80 of that amount, or a reduction of $132,188,040.13. In other words, we have reduced these estimates more than one-third.

I wish to refer to this reduction. I told you we cut the estimates $132,188,040.13. These items of reduction consist first of $23,862,750.78 supposed to be due the Philippine Islands by reason of the action of our President in reducing the gold content of the gold dollar. In the last session of Congress we passed an act authorizing this appropriation. At that time I probably did vote for that act. I have since investigated more fully the facts and now I believe that nothing is due the Philippine government. We will discuss that later, however, under the 5-minute rule.

The next reduction is $20,000,000 from the $40,000,000 for the paid-in surplus of the land banks. The representatives of the Farm Credit Administration conceded this reduction.

We have made a general reduction in various items of $1,839,481.25, items too numerous to mention, many of them small, but they total up to this figure.

General public works decreased $86,490,808.

You will recall that when Congress convened last January the President sent up an estimate in the 1936 Budget for $300,000,000 for public works in a lump sum. After we passed the $4,880,000,000 appropriation for relief and work relief, and after a transfer which Congress made from this $300,000,000 to the $4,880,000,000, I requested the Bureau of the Budget to review the remainder of that estimate of $300,000,000, which had been sent up, with a view to seeing how much more could be transferred from it to the work and work-relief appropriation. In other words, every dollar transferred from the $300,000,000 appropriation to the work and work-relief appropriation would be that much saved in expenditure to the taxpayers. He took it up and conferred with the President and sent in several revisions. As the result of this transfer made by Congress and the revisions suggested by the President, there was a total decrease to start with in this $300,000,000 of $76,000,000, of which $45,000,000 was a net decrease made by the transfer effected by Congress, and $31,000,000 resulted by the revisions made by the Executive. So we cooperated in bringing about this economy.

In addition to this, there are further reductions by the committee of a net amount of $10,490,808, making the total of $86,490,808 to which I have referred.

The amount we allowed, $224,477,561.80, was divided into three parts. Title I, $50,370,899.81, which are the deficiencies for 1935 and prior years, and the regular supplemental appropriations for the years 1935 and 1936. Only $5,000,000 of that $50,000,000 is the ordinary and usual deficiencies that happen every year, and the supplemental amounts for 1935 are a little over $3,000,000. There is no use discussing them. They are fully explained in the report.

The sum of $38,000,000 of that $50,000,000 is a 1936 supplemental to enable the Federal land banks to pay their obligations that arose because the Congress passed two acts reducing the interest rate from an average of 5¼ to 4½ percent on farm mortgages and postponing for 5 years the installments due on the principal borrowed. It was necessary to appropriate that to let them meet those obligations.

There is also a total of about $4,000,000 under title I for other supplemental items for the fiscal year 1936, including $1,000,000 for the projected Air Mail Service from the United States to Asia, $700,000 for payments to contractors with the United States on account of increased costs due to the N. I. R. A., and other justifiable amounts which are fully set forth and explained in the report on the bill. I shall be glad to answer any inquiries about them under the 5-minute rule.

Title III is judgments and authorized claims. It will not be necessary to discuss the third title, because every appropriation under it is made to pay the final judgment of a court or to pay claims that have been audited or settled under the general law. The amount for that is $592,469.99.

The other title, title III, which carries a total of $173,509,192 for general public works, is divided into several subjects and activities. First, the Tennessee Valley Authority. That is allowed $34,675,192. Veterans' hospital improvement, $20,000,000.

Boulder Canyon project, $14,000,000.

Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department, $13,874,000; increase of Navy, reserve supplies of armament and ammunition, $6,110,000.

Foreign Service buildings, $1,000,000.

Public buildings outside the District of Columbia, $58,000,000.

Public buildings within the District of Columbia, $6,000,000.

Buildings, utilities, and so forth, West Point Military Academy, and the new airdrome in Hawaii, $9,850,000.

Rivers and harbors, $10,000,000.

This makes a total of $173,909,192.

First, the Tennessee Valley Authority: $34,675,192 has been allowed. To begin with, let me state that the Muscle Shoals project started during the war cost the Government $163,000,000. Since we created the Tennessee Valley Authority we appropriated $50,000,000 and $25,000,000, respectively, last fiscal year and this fiscal year, which makes a total of $75,000,000 they have had for expenditure. They have spent or obligated, or will have spent or obligated all of this sum except a little over $10,000,000 by July 1 next.

The first estimate that came to the committee on that project for next year was $60,000,000. I requested the Bureau of the Budget to review it. They reviewed it and reduced it to $50,000,000. Those who control the Tennessee Valley Authority came before the committee and voluntarily reduced the estimate to $42,000,000. Your committee considered it and further reduced it to between $34,000,000 and $35,000,000. So the amount asked to be appropriated has come down from an original estimate of $60,000,000 to an amount allowed of between $34,000,000 and $35,000,000.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. Was not authority given in the act creating the Tennessee Valley Authority to issue bonds to the extent of $50,000,000?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; authority was given for them to issue bonds to the extent of $50,000,000 for construction purposes, but this power has never been utilized and not one bond has ever been issued.

Mr. BOLTON. Is any of the $34,000,000 appropriated in this bill to be used for construction purposes?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; all but about $2,000,000 is to be used for construction purposes.

Mr. BOLTON. Why should not bond issues be utilized first?

Mr. BUCHANAN. To be perfectly frank with the gentleman, I doubt if you could sell those bonds unless the Government guaranteed them. Is not this a good answer?

Mr. BOLTON. I think that is a very fair answer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The next item I shall discuss is the provision for veterans' hospitals, $20,000,000. The facts show that the veterans' hospitals have now in round numbers 23,500 beds for neuropsychiatric cases against an immediate load of 30,247 patients of that type. This money will provide 11,466 new beds, of which 6,835 are for these mental cases. Many of them are now confined in non-Federal institutions, where they are not receiving adequate treatment in some instances. By all means this appropriation should be allowed and these hospital facilities extended. This appropriation is not for new hospitals but is for additions to various existing hospitals, which are strategically situated so as to be in close proximity to a great number of those who stand in need of beds. There is no occasion to discuss this item further. Everyone understands it.

For Boulder Canyon $14,000,000 is carried in this bill, to be used principally for power machinery. Another $14,000,000 will complete the project. They will be producing power at Boulder Canyon by the end of this year, and selling power if the transmission lines are in shape.

For public buildings outside the District of Columbia the original estimate was $45,000,000. I requested the Bureau of the Budget to reconsider it, and they increased it to $53,000,000. I found that that was not enough, because I believed that every Member of Congress should stand upon an equal footing in a general public-buildings program. I was determined that because the building or construction industry has suffered so much by reason of private enterprise not putting up buildings and because so many people were out of employment that it should be scattered or equitably spread throughout the Nation. So I requested Admiral Peoples to submit a figure showing how much it would cost to put one public building in every congressional district in the United States. He submitted an estimate of $58,000,000. Your committee increased the Budget estimate to meet this figure, and I believe it was the right thing to do.

Every congressional district, in order to be eligible, must have a city or town where the postal receipts are $10,000 a year or more. If the receipts are less than that, the general law prohibits the construction of a Government building. There is one exception, and that is if there are other Government activities that need and demand space in that town, then the postal receipts may go below $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. In connection with the building of post offices, is the list that was published here 2 or 3 years ago by the Treasury Department followed?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There will be found in our hearings two lists; one called "No. 1" and one "No. 2." No 1 takes into account all of the balance of the buildings that have not been selected under the first appropriation made under House Report 1879, Seventy-third Congress. No. 2 is a list of buildings in other places. The number of buildings in both lists is 1153 and all are upon an equal footing, and a building may be selected out of either list or it may be chosen under certain conditions if not on the list.

Mr. SNELL. And we do not have to follow either one particularly?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not either one particularly.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Will each Member of Congress be given a chance to recommend the replacement of buildings in his district?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman know Admiral Peoples personally?

Mr. SHORT. I do not know him personally.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, there is not a finer man in the Government service today, or one who is more anxious to cooperate with the Members of Congress in every way than Admiral Peoples.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman suggest a remedy whereby a Congressman may extricate himself from the embarrassment of selecting a particular town in his district where five or six towns may be eligible?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Just whisper to Admiral Peoples, and he will take the whole blame.

Mr. SHORT. I hope he will allow us to use the marble that we quarry down in Missouri to construct some of these buildings.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is provided $6,000,000 for buildings in the District of Columbia with an authorization carried in the bill to make a contract for a greater amount.

One of these is the Government Printing Office. Every Member of Congress who has been down to that plant knows that improvements are needed. Some of the present buildings are fire traps and inefficient. We would save close to $400,000 a year if these new buildings are constructed.

Another building is provided for the Comptroller General's office. The bill provides for remodeling the exterior and interior of the old Pension Office Building and adding two wings to increase the space by 389,000 square feet.

Another matter is the improvements at West Point. Of course, when we increased the number of cadets at West Point we were told it would not be necessary to make additional appropriations for buildings by reason of this increase. We were told they could put three cadets in a room if necessary and that is what they will have to do temporarily, but it is not good permanent housing or for the best interest of the boys or the school. Barrack accommodations there are barely sufficient for the average of 1,300 cadets now, and we cannot increase the membership by 600 and not provide for more housing. This provision is necessary if we are suitably to maintain 1,900 cadets at West Point.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I have time to say. If there are any questions, I will be glad to answer them.

Mr. BOLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOLTON. With reference to West Point, may I ask who testified it would be necessary to appropriate additional money in order to house these additional cadets?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not recall the officer's name.

Mr. BOLTON. I happen to be a member of the War Department Appropriations Committee, and it was testified before our subcommittee concerning West Point that no additional money was necessary to be appropriated in order to house these cadets.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman asks, Who was it that gave this testimony before the deficiency subcommittee?

Mr. BOLTON. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not recall.

Mr. TABER. Colonel Chaffee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is his name and in the hearings on this bill he acknowledged such a statement was made and was very fair in his explanation of it.

Mr. SHORT. It is now certain that we are going to have the appointment of these additional cadets?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. The gentleman and other Members of Congress have been notified to hold examinations.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN].

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address my remarks particularly to the item in this measure making appropriation for the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is my contention that this appropriation is premature and wholly out of time.

The scheme of the Tennessee Valley Act, adopted in May 1933, was to provide an Authority to take control of the Government facilities at Muscle Shoals and operate them, as well as build the Norris Dam, and beyond that to be a planning board, which was to make a survey and examination of the territory and report to Congress a plan for the development of the Tennessee Valley.

This provision is particularly set forth in sections 22 and 23 of the act—and I ask unanimous consent to print them as a part of my remarks—wherein the Authority was specifically authorized to make such survey, report to the President, to enable the President to report to Congress, in order that the Congress could control and guide the extent, the sequence, and the nature of the development that was to be determined and developed in the Tennessee Valley:

SEC. 22. To aid further the proper use, conservation, and development of the natural resources of the Tennessee River drainage basin and of such adjoining territory as may be related to or materially affected by the development consequent to this act, and to provide for the general welfare of the citizens of said areas, the President is hereby authorized, by such means or methods as he may deem proper within the limits of appropriations made therefor by Congress, to make such surveys of and general plans for said Tennessee Basin and adjoining territory as may be useful to the Congress and to the several States in guiding and controlling the extent, sequence, and nature of development that may be equitably and economically advanced through the expenditure of public funds, or through the guidance or control of public authority, all for the general purpose of fostering an orderly and proper physical, economic, and social development of said areas; and the President is further authorized in making said surveys and plans to cooperate with the States affected thereby, or subdivisions or agencies of such States, or with cooperative or other organizations, and to make such studies, experiments, or demonstrations as may be necessary and suitable to that end.

SEC. 23. The President shall, from time to time, as the work provided for in the preceding section progresses, recommend to Congress such legislation as he deems proper to carry out the general purposes stated in said section, and for the especial purpose of bringing about in said Tennessee Drainage Basin and adjoining territory in conformity with said general purposes (1) the maximum amount of flood control; (2) the maximum development of said Tennessee River for navigation purposes; (3) the maximum generation of electric power consistent with flood control and navigation; (4) the proper use of marginal lands; (5) the proper method of reforestation of all lands in said drainage basin suitable for reforestation; and (6) the economic and social well-being of the people living in said river basin.

Section 23 provides specifically that the President shall, from time to time, as the work provided in section 22 progresses, report to the Congress, who shall determine upon the nature of the development according to the subheads and divisions laid down by section 23.

The Tennessee Valley Authority, in order to carry these operations into effect, was given authority to issue $50,000,000 in bonds, and this bond issue was to be its working capital, together with the income that might come from the sale of electricity, which they had the right to use until such time as Congress should determine upon the extent, the sequence, and the nature of the development to be carried on in that valley.

Now, what has happened? The bonds have not been issued. This may be because they could not sell them, as Chairman BUCHANAN has said, but the fact remains that Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, the president of the Tennessee Valley Authority, testified before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, and when asked why the bonds had not been sold, stated, "It seems to us that that is not the right way to do it."

This is characteristic of this Authority which has been put in charge of the Tennessee Valley. They have arrogated to themselves legislative privileges and prerogatives. They have said to the country, "We have no respect for the mandate of Congress. The way Congress has prescribed for the development of the Tennessee Valley is not the way we think it ought to be done." So they go to the Public Works authority, behind the back of Congress, which illustrates the danger of Congress delegating power and handing $3,300,000,000 to the Public Works Administration—and out of that amount they get $25,000,000 to begin their operations. Then they come in and deceive the committees of Congress and get $50,000,000 more. Then they organize, under the laws of the State of Delaware, a corporation known as the "Electric Home & Farm Authority", a wholly illegal procedure for creatures of Congress, when Congress itself has the right to create corporations and would have given them authority to exercise the functions of a Delaware corporation if we had intended they should do so, but they got from the emergency relief organization another $1,000,000 for the Delaware corporation, which is its invested capital. Then they go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as an independent business organization, a Delaware corporation, and make a contract whereby the Reconstruction Finance Corporation agrees to advance them $10,000,000 of the money of the United States to buy chattel mortgages on electrical equipment. They go to the Conservation Corps and have assigned to their operations between 5,000 and 6,000 men, the cost of which comes out of the appropriations for the Conservation Corps. Then they have a large army of workers assigned to them to help them in their operations from the civil works appropriations and the relief organizations in and around Knoxville and Chattanooga. The number of men engaged in this operation I do not know, but it is considerable.

Then they appropriate for their purposes the sum of $548,650, the receipts from the sale of electricity, so that up to this point they have $86,848,000 to expend exclusive of the cost of C. C. C. and C. W. A. workers, and they have not yet issued the bonds.

We are asked by this bill to add $34,675,000, which will make their expenditure $121,523,000 for their operations up to the present time, and what are they spending it on? Are they spending it upon a program laid out by Congress? Have they reported to Congress what their plan of operation is? Does Congress know where these dams are to be constructed and whether they are a part of a general program for the development of the Tennessee Valley for the public welfare and upon a sensible scale? The report provided for in sections 22 and 23 of the act has not been made to Congress. The survey has not been made, and Congress knows nothing at all about what they have in mind. Nowhere, in all the literature there is on this subject, has anything been told Congress about what the program of the Authority is, how long it will take to complete, or what it will cost. Nowhere, in the annual report of the Tennessee Valley Authority to Congress is there any reference to the scheme of development which they have as to how many dams they ultimately intend to build, and a Member of Congress has to go elsewhere to get the information. I have read some 30 or 40 articles in various publications by, and interviews with, members of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Members will agree with me that the Fortune Magazine is a publication worthy of belief, and there I get this information about what they intend to do.

They intend to complete the Norris Dam, which is one-third completed, at an expense of $34,000,000.

Mr. TABER. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a suggestion?

Mr. McLEAN. I will.

Mr. TABER. According to the hearings we had and the figures they submitted to us, the Norris Dam is to cost $36,000,000.

Mr. McLEAN. I thank the gentleman. That adds $2,000,000 more to my calculation.

The Wheeler Dam, which is one-half completed, is to cost $38,000,000.

The Pickwick Dam, just started, will cost $22,000,000.

The Hiawassee Dam will cose $13,000,000.

The French Broad Dam will cost $30,000,000.

The Aurora Dam will cost $42,000,000.

The total for dam construction, with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], will be $181,000,000, to which they have committed the Government of the United States, and this article goes on to state that in addition to these, it is their purpose to construct 20 or 30 additional dams.

I asked Dr. Morgan if this were a true statement, and he said, "No; it is wrong in some respects", and I asked him wherein and he said to the extent of the 20 or 30 additional dams, stating, "We do not intend to build that many additional dams." However, there was no denial of the obligation of $179,000,000.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. Are the various dams which the gentleman has mentioned to be built for power purposes or for navigation purposes as well?

Mr. McLEAN. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio I am not informed, Congress is not informed, no program has been submitted to Congress in accordance with sections 22 and 23 of the act. If they had properly regarded the mandate of that act, we would have before us the information that the gentleman wants.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BOLTON. My idea was that matters of navigation had to be passed upon by the Engineer Corps of the Army.

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Tennessee Valley Authority has taken charge of the entire neighborhood and driven the Army engineers out. This is supposed to be for national defense.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. TABER. According to the figures submitted to our committee, this is going to cost $192,900,000.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this whole situation is so involved that every time we examine one of these witnesses, one of the directors of the T. V. A., you get an entirely different picture.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman stated that he had data that he wished to put in, but he has not had the consent of the committee.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert sections 22 and 23 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEAN. This whole proposition is predicated upon national defense. It must have some justification that will bring it within the right of Congress to spend money. So an attempt is made to justify it on the grounds of national defense.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Is that why they purchased 25 dairy cows at a cost of $372 per head?

Mr. McLEAN. We cannot inquire into the mental processes of the directors of the T. V. A. I am not familiar with that type of men, for I have not had much experience with them, those who hold Congress in contempt, but they were authorized to dispose of surplus power being generated at Muscle Shoals. They were to use the power to generate and manufacture fertilizer. When the T. V. A. Act of May 13, 1933, was on the floor, many southern gentlemen enthusiastically voted for it because they looked forward to the time when all the farmers of the Tennessee Valley would have cheaper and better fertilizer. Last year they estimated the income from the sale of fertilizer at $507,000. When Dr. Morgan was before the Committee on Military Affairs, I asked him how much fertilizer they had sold. He said they had sold no fertilizer and did not intend to sell any, that they were only experimenting in a better grade.

So they have abandoned the possibility of getting $507,000 out of the sale of fertilizer, and the wonder to me is why they put it in their budget as anticipated revenue. But having put it in the budget and being engaged in the manufacture of fertilizer, why did they ever abandon it before the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. SHORT. Is it not a fact that their expenditures have far exceeded their estimates, and that their revenues are pitifully below their estimates?

Mr. McLEAN. There is no doubt of it. When you have $75,000,000 allowed to you and you expend $101,000,000, you are exceeding your authorized appropriation and you are liable to indictment in New Jersey, and should be under the Federal law. Let us see what the Authority intends in the matter of national defense. As a matter of fact, it is so much of a subterfuge that when witnesses and directors of the Authority were before the committee and were asked their object and purposes and reasons for it all, after the witness had finished his statement of flood control and reforestation, a member of the committee had to inject the words "national defense" to remind the witness that he is engaged in a national-defense enterprise.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. BOLTON. Would the gentleman explain where national defense comes in on the present operation?

Mr. McLEAN. This is all we know, and I shall give you the substance of what Mr. David E. Lilienthal testified to before the committee on that subject.

Mr. BOLTON. My understanding is that the national-defense purpose was to manufacture nitrates. Nitrates are made all over the country, are they not, and not at Muscle Shoals alone?

Mr. McLEAN. I know that we can make most of the nitrates necessary in New Jersey.

The basis of the development is national defense. The production of fertilizer, both as to price and quality, was the primary purpose of many of those who voted for the Tennessee Valley Authority—not only for the benefit of the farmers but because it placed the Government in a position where its fertilizer plants could be immediately turned into war-time production of munitions.

It does not appear that there is any plan or program of the General Staff of the War Department that is being worked out. The chief chemist of the T. V. A. consulted with the Chemical Warfare Division on one or two occasions, but the real idea of national defense has been considered of secondary importance. The attitude of the T. V. A. in this regard can best be gathered from the testimony of Director Lilienthal on that subject before the Committee on Military Affairs—pages 398 to 400—wherein he states that the Authority is obviously not a part of the War Department and has no policy authorization with respect to war; that they know nothing about it; and that they have a physical plant in their custody—in a sense as trustee of the War Department—whenever they call for it. They have no duty to initiate national-defense policies but to carry them out when they have been initiated by the proper officers of the General Staff; the Board has had no conference with the War Department or Navy Department as to what part the Tennessee Valley Authority would play in time of war, and all of its proposed development of power is not related to any war-time activity resulting from any scheme or plan. In spite of the fact that this whole project is predicated upon being useful as a part of the national defense, they have taken no steps to coordinate the resources at their command with other agencies of the Government with which they would be required to cooperate in the event of an emergency.

According to the statement filed by Dr. Morgan with the Committee on Appropriations, the cost of this kind of national defense to the Government of the United States has been $9,854,227, as per the following table which I take from the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, page 475:

National defense and fertilizer program

	Actual, fiscal year 1934	Allotment, fiscal year 1935	Estimate, fiscal year 1936
A. Muscle Shoals general properties	$513,588	$929,325	$250,000
B. Fertilizer projects, nitrate plant no. 2	560,512	3,064,455	3,508,000
C. Fertilizer demonstrations, Valley States		266,407	762,000
Total, national-defense program	1,074,100	4,260,187	4,520,000

They frankly say that the farmers of the South will get no benefit from this cheap fertilizer unless perhaps the processes which they initiate can be successfully used by private industry, and private industry will cooperate, using T. V. A. methods instead of their own.

Mr. THURSTON. And should it not be made to appear to the House that no fertilizer whatever is being manufactured for the farmer? They are making it for experimental purposes.

Mr. McLEAN. They manufactured it in large amounts and are putting it in storage.

Mr. THURSTON. And just one other matter that I want to have cleared up. When it was stated that the completed project would cost $192,000,000, on page 489 of the hearings, Dr. Arthur E. Morgan states it would cost $250,000,000 when the power plant is completed, so that with the way in which Government matters are handled it will probably aggregate $300,000,000.

Mr. McLEAN. Dr. Morgan has said this is a continuing program. It will never be finished. It will always be a drain on the Treasury. It cannot be self-liquidating. I have said there ought to be a plan and that the board of directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority have no plan. Here is an illustration of the way that they operate in the Tennessee Valley. They built a town called "Norris" to house the employees at the dam. The building of this town illustrates the manner in which the project has been carried on and how little attention is given to estimated cost and expenditure of public funds. Here is an extract from the annual report of the Authority. I preface my remarks by saying that they anticipated this town was going to cost $2,000,000, and when they got through it cost $3,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has again expired.

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. McLEAN. I am reading from the annual report of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Is the gentleman a member of the firm of Whittemore & McLean, of Elizabeth, N. J.?

Mr. McLEAN. I am.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. As a member of that firm the gentleman has long since been connected with a considerable number of public utilities.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; and many of the banks in the place.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. The Electric and Power Trusts.

Mr. McLEAN. I never had a job from any electric company. I never have been connected with any electric corporation; and if I had it would make no difference to me. I am an American before I am an individual.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. I just asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. McLEAN. I will answer the question. I do not care anything about that book the gentleman from Mississippi has. I am talking on the merits of the question before the House. Whatever there is there concerns my partners and myself, and if it says that we ever got a dollar out of a power company it is wrong.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. But your partners did. Read this.

Mr. McLEAN. No; nor my partners. I do not have to read this. I will tell you something if you want to know what I am.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Will the gentleman read that? I hope the gentleman will not get angry. Will the gentleman just read that?

Mr. McLEAN. I will tell the gentleman something if he wants to know what I am. When I was elected to Congress my name was on the court list as attorney for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad in my district. It has been quite generally known that I have been attorney for many of the banks in the county, and what my affiliations are.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. How about the electric company?

Mr. McLEAN. I never had anything to do with any electric company. That is my misfortune.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Will the gentleman read this?

Mr. McLEAN. The building of the town of Norris is another illustration of the manner in which the project is being carried on and how little attention is given to estimating costs. This is illustrated by the following excerpt from the annual report of the Authority to Congress:

> The camp and town were originally planned to cost about $2,000,000, and to include dormitories for 700 men, cottages for 250 families, buildings for the operation of a training program for workmen, community buildings, and other necessary incidental facilities. Prices of materials and prevailing rates of wages advanced sharply while the town was under construction, and the construction schedule of the dam was advanced, requiring more housing, both in dormitories and dwellings. It appeared at the end of the fiscal year that the total cost of the camp and town, including all overhead, would be about $3,500,000.

Speaking of the first group of houses, the report says:

> Experience in the construction of these Houses indicated costs considerably in excess of estimates, due to advancing material prices, wage rates, and the pressure for rapid completion. The direct cost of construction for labor and materials averaged about $5,200 per house, including direct cost in connection with electrical heating and major electrical equipment of about $750. All overhead items will eventually be allocated and the basis of allocation to be used is being studied. In view of the depression level of rent in surrounding areas, monthly rents were set initially to average about $31 per house.

In other words, in the building of the town of Norris we find the actual cost was 75 percent in excess of that estimated, that rentals were based on depression levels in surrounding areas and not on the cost of construction or a reasonable charge for the accommodations provided, and the Authority states that the allocation of overhead is being studied. Any reasonable business man would have determined the overhead and allocated it to the proper account before the project was started. Furthermore, this town was built with full knowledge of the fact that, upon completion of the Cove Creek-Norris Dam, but 20 or 30 men would be required to carry on operations there and would be all the people available to occupy the houses unless the Government supplied other families with the necessary means. A comparable city to house 3,000 people employed at the Grand Coulee Dam in Washington was built for $1,000,000, and is described in the April 1935 issue of the Reclamation Era, published by the Department of the Interior.

Great stress has been laid upon attracting industries to the Tennessee Valley. The act provides that for 1 year after its enactment liberal terms might be made to attract industries or manufacturing establishments to the neighborhood (section 24). The Authority have had agents going about the country to "sell" the town of Norris to those who might be attracted to the neighborhood. Thus they have entered into competition with the boards of trade of every progressive community in the country, and it is not of record that their expensive bureau maintained for this purpose has brought a single industry to the locality. The limitation provided in the act has expired, but the activity continues.

At a meeting of the Authority on October 13, 1933, the thought was advanced that the Authority must work toward an increase in the use of electricity, and that increased use of current would benefit both the utility companies and the Authority, and attention was directed to the possibility of marketing electrical appliances. It was suggested that the Authority get permission from Congress to do this. Notwithstanding this conviction of the limitation upon their powers without the consent of Congress, the three directors organized the corporation under the laws of the State of Delaware, to which I have referred. The purpose of this corporation is to encourage people to purchase electrical appliances on the installment plan, one of the practices which experts say helped to bring on the depression. The corporation discounts the notes, chattel mortgages, or conditional sales agreements for the manufacturer. The corporation is financed with Government funds and the Government must take the loss of all unpaid installments. The invested capital of the corporation is $1,000,000, made available from Emergency Relief funds, and a credit of $10,000,000 has been set up by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for its use. In this matter they have flagrantly exceeded their authority, because, had Congress intended that they should undertake any such enterprise, that authority would have been given them. Congress has the power to create corporations and designate their activities and exercise control of expenditures. The wisdom of men who are themselves the agents of Congress undertaking quasi public and private activities by the creation of a corporation under State law and financed with Government funds, is doubtful, and under some circumstances reprehensible. It would seem particularly reprehensible in this instance because of the conviction of the directors that authority for this activity should be obtained from Congress. This activity is wholly illegal, and yet, if I understand the purpose of the Authority correctly, they intend to extend it throughout the country in competition with established manufacturing and financing companies. It appears that this corporation has 22 employees, and that its annual pay roll is $58,900 per year. Two of its executives receive $6,000 each, one receives $4,500, and the others range from $3,200 to $1,440.

The Authority has also organized a Corporation under the laws of the State of Tennessee, known as the "Tennessee Valley Associated Cooperatives, Inc.", the invested capital of which, $300,000, was contributed by the Emergency Relief Administrator. The salary of the Administrator is $6,800 per year. The annual report of the Authority refers to their activities as members of this Corporation as follows:

> The activities of this Corporation were designed primarily to improve the winter diet of as many persons in need of relief as possible. The prevalence of tuberculosis and pellagra showed the necessity for a more correct diet, particularly the use of more green vegetables and dairy products. The cooperative projects aided during the initial period, therefore, included 1 cannery, 2 existing canneries, and a creamery. A regional farmers' cooperative was established in a group of four western North Carolina counties to promote the development and marketing of crops especially suited to the high altitudes of these counties, and began activities with the production of certified seed potatoes for the lowland market. Studies are under way of the possibilities of cooperatives as a way to increase the degree of economic self-support of the region.

This is all that is said on this subject, and it is, therefore, fair to assume that it is all they have to show for an investment of $300,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN] has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I repeat what was thought to be a solution of the Muscle Shoals situation is rapidly creating other and more serious problems. At the moment the situation is involved in indefiniteness and uncertainty, and if allowed to continue will become more difficult to unravel. Already there has made its appearance a bill by Representative TAYLOR of Tennessee, seeking a contribution by Congress, pointing to the fact that the taking of lands for this development has impaired the value of the bonds of several counties and has placed the burden of the payment of these bonds upon the remaining land owners. In Union County 42 percent of the taxable values of the county have been taken by the Authority, leaving the bonds to be paid by 58 percent of the valuations which were taxable at the time of the bond issue. In Campbell and Anderson Counties 20 percent of the assessable values have been taken out of the tax budgets, in Claiborne County 25 percent, and in Hancock and Grainger Counties 5 percent. This is one of the matters that will involve the United States in controversy and expense, and should have been thought out with other preliminary matters as a part of a plan of orderly and businesslike procedure. The only thought that the Authority seems to have given this phase of the situation is referred to in its annual report, on page 5, as follows:

> The construction of the Norris Dam will result in cutting one county in two, school districts carrying bonded indebtedness will be submerged, and other changes will bring about a need for adjustments. Studies are under way to work out the necessary adjustments and to produce, if possible, an improvement in social and economic status.

Congress has reason to be anxious because of a lack of knowledge of the objectives of the Authority, and because it has no way of knowing to what extent it is to be involved in contracts or financial outlay. The mandate of Congress providing for an orderly program of development is being ignored by those whom Congress thought would respect its wishes. The Authority has appropriated to itself legislative as well as administrative functions. What was thought to be the solution of the Muscle Shoals situation is rapidly creating other and more serious problems. There are grave dangers in allowing this situation to continue as at present, not the least of which is the attitude of those who constitute the Authority toward the law under which they are acting. Ours is a Government of laws, not of individuals. We cannot hope to exist without respect for law and constituted authority, especially on the part of those who are representatives of the Government.

The Authority has disregarded the mandate of the law, and has seen fit to construe it to suit its own purposes.

All will agree that the way for the Government to fail is by disregard of law and orderly procedure, and by the usurpation of power by those who are placed in a position of authority and who seek to interpret the law to suit their own devices and to carry out purposes far beyond the intent of the Congress or any power which Congress had the right to confer. The procedure of Congress, insofar as I am informed, and the procedure of all law-making bodies has been to enact laws establishing policies to be supplemented by the necessary appropriations to make those policies effective. With meticulous care we plan for the Army, the Navy, and the activities of all administrative governmental departments, and for guidance in all their undertakings they look to the law for the mandate of Congress.

The principle behind this is that we are a free people acting through our accredited Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Those intrusted with any of the functions of government are but the servants of Congress, to which they are accountable. The Tennessee Valley Authority has disregarded this fundamental principle of government. The Congress is not required to reserve any of its prerogatives. Such reservations are inherent. There is only one power that can supplant it and that is the sovereign will of the people. It is a new kind of government when a board or body created by the Congress can ignore it, hold it in contempt, establish policies, and create indebtedness on the assumption that Congress would not even dare to repudiate its acts. Such is the attitude of the T. V. A. They have resolved all doubts in favor of themselves. They have embarked upon a program which Congress never contemplated, and left Congress in ignorance thereof. If this program should fail, the responsibility must fall upon the Congress which created and let run free the instrumentality of government which put it in motion.

The Authority should be required to put its house in order, to comply with sections 22 and 23, to the end that an orderly program may be determined upon and that Congress may have full knowledge of the purposes and intentions of the Authority and act intelligently when occasion arises.

I want to say to the gentleman who is interested in my private career that the people of Union County, N. J., know my standing, they know my affiliations, and they know with whom I have been associated. I have never obscured it from any of them. Furthermore, whenever I have an opponent who is engaged in a meritorious proposition, honestly convinced of the cause which he is advocating, trying to lay before the people the true facts of the situation, trying to even make the President of the United States know how he is being imposed upon, I hope never to use the kind of tactics that have been advanced here today. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, this bill contains some appropriations for public buildings in the city of Washington and some appropriations for the Army and the Navy. I think it is not inappropriate to call the attention of the Committee to some of the figures regarding the costs of public buildings in Washington and regarding the Army and Navy appropriations up to date.

I want to read the costs of some of the main public buildings in this city. I shall leave out the odd figures in order to not confuse the reading.

The Archives Building cost $8,500,000, the Commerce Building cost $17,000,000, the connecting wing between the Department of Labor and the Interstate Commerce Commission cost approximately $2,000,000, the Internal Revenue Building cost $8,000,000, the Interstate Commerce Commission Building cost approximately $4,500,000, the Department of Justice cost $10,000,000, the Department of Labor cost approximately $5,000,000, the Post Office Department cost a little over $9,000,000. All the magnificent buildings within the triangle cost $65,951,433.64. The total cost of the Treasury Building up to date is a little more than $8,000,000. The total cost of this magnificent building—the Capitol—is approximately $15,000,000. The total cost of the Library Building, including the book stacks, an addition to the library, and the auditorium, something over $9,000,000. The total cost of all buildings in the triangle, the Treasury Department, the Capitol, and the Library is ninety-eight and one-half million dollars. These figures on the triangle buildings and the Treasury Department are secured from the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department. The other figures are secured from the Architect of the Capitol.

Some of those buildings are luxuriously magnificent. Some of them are equipped with a magnificence to which many people have objected, and I think rather rightfully, but the spending on our public buildings is not a drop in the bucket compared to the spending we have already authorized on the Army and Navy this year and that we probably are going to continue to authorize in the future.

The War Department appropriation for the 1936 year is $401,998,000. That figure is an increase of $50,000,000 over the current year.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. It seems to me that just a few years ago, under another administration, the ship George Washington, costing $40,000,000, was towed out into the Atlantic Ocean and sunk. That is about half the value of all the buildings the gentleman has mentioned. Just a moment ago we heard a speech about the huge sums of money invested in the Tennessee Valley Authority. After all, this is a development of resources within the United States and for the American people.

Mr. BIERMANN. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

This appropriation of $401,000,000 does not include P. W. A. allotments, which, as set forth on page 6 of the report on the Army appropriations bill by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS], run into hundreds of millions of dollars.

The Navy appropriation bill passed this House carrying appropriations of approximately $459,000,000, an increase of $172,000,000 over the current fiscal year. If no increase is made in the Navy appropriation bill in conference the total appropriation for war preparedness for the next fiscal year will be more than $860,000,000. The P. W. A. allotments will surely bring our expenditures on the Army and Navy above $1,000,000,000 for 1936.

It is interesting to me to note what it costs the people of this country to run its Army and Navy by the day and by the month. It costs the American people in appropriations made by this Congress, aside from the P. W. A. allotments, $71,720,000 to run our Army and Navy Departments 1 month. It costs more than $2,350,000 to run these departments 1 day. Every month we spend on our Army and our Navy, exclusive of the P. W. A. moneys, more than the total cost of all the magnificent buildings in the Triangle. In a month and 12 days we spend on our Army and our Navy more money than the Government has spent to erect all the public buildings in the Triangle, plus the cost of the Treasury Building, plus the cost of this magnificent Capitol Building, plus the cost of the Congressional Library and its annex.

I am well aware of the fact that it does no good at this time to talk about Army and Navy expenditures. I am well aware of the fact that this body is obsessed with the idea that we have to "prepare" ourselves against some foreign foe; but I want to leave this thought in the minds of those who are listening to me, that you cannot get any Army or Navy officer, I do not care how low or how high his rank, to sign his name to a statement setting out any plan under which any foreign nation or combination of foreign nations could land soldiers on the continental United States.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct in his statement. If we would only listen to the Father of his Country, George Washington, and read his Farewell Address instead of simply giving it lip service, and follow his policy of being friends with all and trading with all, but keeping out of the quarrels of other nations, we could save a lot of this money.

Mr. BIERMANN. I am sure we could. It is well to remember that in the World War the Allies had the two largest navies in the world, besides the Navy of France and several other powers, yet these navies of the Allies failed to take any land fortification, failed to take a single German port, and, so far as I know, they never fired a hostile shot onto German soil from the water. All the navies of the Allies that massed at Gallipoli were unable to maintain their foothold. Yet we are making these appropriations for battleships, some costing $29,000,000, and airplane carriers costing $40,000,000 under the theory that some foreign foe or combination of foreign foes can transport soldiers over 3,000 miles of Atlantic or 5,000 miles of Pacific water and land them on our shores in sufficient numbers to make them a menace to our country. I repeat, that I venture the assertion that you cannot get an Army officer or a Navy officer of any rank whatsoever to sign his name to any statement that will show how any foreign foe or combination of foreign forces can successfully attack the continental United States; yet we are making these appropriations in the name of preparation to defend our own shores. Admiral Stirling recently urged that we use our Navy to combine with other countries in an attack on Russia. But I venture to say that neither this warlike gentleman nor any other navy man is willing to endanger his reputation by saying that all the other navies of the world combined could successfully attack the continental United States.

I agree that we may see the time that airplanes will be able to fly across the ocean and drop poison gas or disease germs on the other shore. But I am sure that no Army or Navy officer of repute will say that battleships or cruisers are a defense against them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, it seems appropriate, at a time when the Congress is making appropriations to cover money deficiencies in the governmental departments, to point out what to me are deficiencies in other directions, not monetary, but in policies with their possible results.

We are spending vast sums to combat an economic situation from which the United States, with the rest of the world, has suffered during the past 6 years. It is appalling what this has cost us. The actual and estimated Federal exenditures for 1934, 1935, and 1936 amount to $24,206,533,000. From 1789 to 1913, according to the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, a period of 124 years, the expenses of the Federal Government amounted to $24,521,845,000, only $300,000,000 more spent in 124 years than during the last 3 for the operation of the Federal Government. And it was the President himself who, during his campaign for election, accused the Hoover administration "of being the greatest spending administration in peace time in all history, one which piled bureau on bureau, commission on commission, and has failed to anticipate the dire needs of reduced earning power of the people." In the month following this acquisition in another campaign speech the President said:

> I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues in this campaign. In my opinion, it is the most direct and effective contribution that Government can make to business.

This is now forgotten, however. Even those charged with directing the present policies have to admit, and do so privately, that we are no further on the road to a normal recovery than we were before the American people became saddled with the tremendous burden of public debt it carries today.

The public-works program, operated at immense cost, has failed because it has not primed the pump. Other nations have tried similar policies and have likewise met with failure. While the P. W. A. made jobs, they were only temporary. There is nothing to replace the projects when they are completed. Billions of the people's money have been appropriated for expenditure under direction of the Public Works Administration. Allotments of these funds in frequent instances furnish examples of action by administrative authority in direct contravention of prior determination of Congress. Reclamation projects, river and harbor improvements, public buildings, and other governmental proposals, denied by Congress after investigation, have been financed by the P. W. A. without reference to the congressional attitude.

When the present administration took office in Washington I was literally swamped with pleas from my constituents to give the new President and his policies my support, to aid him in the fulfillment of his promise to reduce governmental expenditures and balance the Budget, and make it possible for him to test his theories and effect his campaign pledges. Insofar as I was able, I did give the administration my support, but, looking back upon the events of the last 2 years, I am convinced that if we had not been swept along on the hysterical tide, if we had not agreed without due consideration and study to untried visionary proposals, the United States would today be on the road to economic recovery instead of immersed in debt and confusion which will bequeath to future generations intolerable burdens of taxation.

When we took office at this session and at the beginning of the preceding Congress, each of us pledged himself to uphold the Constitution. Notwithstanding this, there have been enacted measures which were known to be unconstitutional and have since been declared so by the Supreme Court, namely, the oil code and the legislation purporting to authorize it, the Railroad Retirement Act, the Frazier-Lemke Act, and the National Industrial Recovery Act. There are others which have not yet reached that Court which will undoubtedly suffer the same fate when their turn comes. It is high time for the Congress to learn that a change may not be made in the Constitution of the United States by a mere wish of the Chief Executive. We have been entirely too complacent and docile in surrendering our function as lawmakers and by doing so have turned the country over to experimenters, making of it a laboratory of experimentation. We have stood by long enough while the press has pointed the finger of scorn at the Congress. We have too far accepted emergency bills of which we had little understanding from the authors of the new deal—those impractical theorists who have been given first consideration while the help of men and women of more than average ability, capable of advising the administration through previous accomplishment in business and the professions, have been distrusted and their advice thrust into the background, if it was heard at all. Bills were drafted not in accordance with the usual practice but outside of our own committees, presented as drawn and then referred to those committees, and as promptly reported. Time and again the sponsors of the measures, when they reached the floor, were reluctant or unable adequately to explain their meaning or effect. We accepted from the executive departments bills so broad in their scope as to touch every economic activity in America, drawn by persons entirely unfamiliar with the intricacies of legislative drafting, so badly phrased in many cases as to make it impossible for a normal mind to fathom. Though we know the importance of and the necessity for the writing by the Congress of all laws which touch economic operations in unequivocal terms instead of leaving such a function to bureaucrats to do with as they please by means of so-called "regulations", but we are guilty of doing just that. The Congress literally abdicated its constitutional function and created, in the Chief Executive and the heads of the Government departments, such dictatorships as had never been dreamed of even in war time, regardless of a warning by the Supreme Court that the legislative body should be specific in its grants of authority to the Executive. By this means there were enacted, in unprecedented time, a bewildering succession of temporary, unsystematic, self-contradictory, and experimental measures for the control of credit; the control of business; the control of agriculture; the control of transportation; the control of the freedom of the air; and the control of liberty, thereby debasing the currency and the obligations of the United States; terrorizing the banking system; increasing the cost of business in every enterprise; plunging industry into labor warfare; taxing one section of the people for the benefit of another; destroying food and clothing materials in a hungry world; increasing costs of relief and squandering the people's money.

In short, the measures which we have enacted have concentrated an enormous power in the hands of the Chief Executive and thereby subjected the life of every American citizen to detailed regulation by a central authority. One of the results is a condition in our currency and banking that may lead to a ruinous inflation, and the succession of mounting Treasury deficits must be met either by crushing taxation or by inflation. We have built up a universal fear which prevents the creation of credit by the banks and dries up the springs of investment upon which recovery depends. Of equal seriousness is the much larger volume of unemployment than we had a year ago, with 22,000,000 people—1 in every 6 of our population—dependent for subsistence on public relief. That is our record of accomplishment.

Running crisscross through the fabric of our governmental system we find active competition with private enterprise. Business, during this period, has not only had to submit to a bureaucratic control which has no precedent, but has had also to face active competition from its Government.

In its examination into Government competition with private enterprise the special committee appointed by the Congress for that purpose, found that there were not less than 225 items of trade, industry, and professional service affected. The committee found that the Navy Department, in addition to plants for the construction of war vessels and submarines and the manufacturing of munitions, had developed facilities for the production of binoculars and optical goods, anchor chains, rope, cans and drums, paint, varnish, polish, furniture, mattresses, hammocks, propellers, engines, fire extinguishers; that the War and Navy Departments manufacture uniforms, clothing of all kinds, leather and harness goods and saddles; that the War Department at its posts and reservations operates laundries, dry-cleaning and dyeing establishments and commissaries at which all kinds and descriptions of articles are sold, including gasoline; and that similar stores are operated at docks and aboard vessels by the Navy Department; that the War and Navy Departments operate transport services, including the Government-owned Panama Railroad Co.; that Army, Navy, and Marine Bands supplant private bands and orchestras at other than official gatherings and on commercial tours; that the Government Printing Office engages in the manufacture of ink, paste, mucilage, blankbooks, and similar articles; that the manufacture and merchandising of stamped envelopes by the Post Office Department is another example of the encroachment of the Government upon private enterprise; that the Parcel Post Service of the Post Office Department competes with the express companies and the operation of the Postal Savings System with banking. The Federal prisons manufacture shoes, brushes, cotton cloth, tents, and automobile tags which are sold in competition with private enterprise; the Census Bureau engages in the manufacture and repair of computing and tabulating machines; through a so-called "welfare service" restaurants and cafeterias are maintained in Government buildings; the Treasury Department is competing with private architects in the execution of plans for public buildings.

The Government as it now exists was conceived and organized for political and social control and activity. It was not vested with any economic function beyond those essential to the proper exercise of its own functions in coining money, collecting and disbursing revenue, emitting credit, operating post offices and carrying mails, and in developing and maintaining military establishments for the protection of the lives and property of its citizens. It was primarily designed "to promote the general welfare and to conserve to its citizens the rights of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.'" The entrance of the Government into commercial and industrial undertakings, backed by public credit and resources and its military and civilian personnel, for the purpose of competing with the business establishments and the opportunities of livelihood of its citizens is, therefore, in general, repugnant to our fundamental democratic institutions and aspirations. Our people, if they so elect, might decide to own and operate their own utilities, or might declare any branch of industry or business to be affected with a public interest, and through proper legal measures might acquire and operate such economic institutions. Even such extreme action, however, under our Constitution would have to be carried out without any confiscation or impairment of private property or property rights, but no constitutional authority exists whatsoever which would permit the Government deliberately to engage in business in any form which competes with and impairs the private business of its citizens except for reasons of economy or fiscal and military expediency.

Notwithstanding this, we are confronted with a proposal to widen the scope of Government competition and control by the operation of electric and gas utility companies and the complete abolition of the holding company, though I am informed that the House will not contain this provision, but in its stead provides for strict regulation of the holding companies. To eliminate the holding companies means the confiscation of private property belonging to approximately 5,000,000 investors throughout the United States who have placed hard-earned life savings in utility stocks. The great majority fall in the low-salary brackets and include men and women in all walks of life, charitable organizations, hospitals, educational institutions, fraternal groups, churches, and church societies, and neighborhood groups.

I have no quarrel with proper regulation. On the contrary, in my opinion, there should be proper regulation, and I should gladly give my support to such a measure; but I would be unwilling to vote for any bill which does not set forth the provisions by which such companies are to be governed. Human frailties being what they are, I think it is unsafe, unsound, and, most of all, unconstitutional, to allow a board of men and women to entirely regulate any industry. We have just passed through an experiment by which the law governing all industries was written by the heads of the N. R. A. as they thought the need arose, and I for one have no intention of harassing any industry with a similar situation again.

Let us grant, then, that we have need for regulation and control. Knowing this, we should carefully study that need and as carefully prepare in unequivocal terms a law which will adequately regulate the industry insofar as the Federal Government constitutionally can.

In considering the holding companies we must not lose sight of the fact that they have their advantages as well as their disadvantages; by furnishing centralized managerial control to operating companies in the form of highly specialized, highly trained, and highly paid legal, engineering, and accounting talent; aid in financing, combined purchasing power, equipment held under holding company patents, or manufactured by the subsidiaries of the holding company, and means of expansion. These are of inestimable value to the small operating plant and thereby to the community each serves.

Electric energy is essentially a local commodity. It is local as to service, generation, and distribution. Acquaintance with local conditions and valuations is necessary for efficient, economical, and satisfactory regulation. I am informed that only about 17 percent of the energy generated is transmitted in interstate commerce and that not more than 1 to 2 percent of this is actually sold at wholesale for resale, the remaining portion being merely passed by the same company or companies across State lines without any wholesale sales. Production, therefore, is wholly with the States.

During its consideration in the Senate, the sponsors of the so-called "public-utility bill" repeatedly asserted that there is nothing in it which will tend to control intrastate commerce; only interstate commerce. The Senator from Delaware, in an effort to obtain a plain statement on this point, said:

I merely wish to make it clear to the Senate that his (Senator WHEELER'S) theory is that the mere exchange of correspondence between the holding company and the public utility which is operating in a single State, constitutes interstate commerce.

The Senator from Montana replied:

I now cite a case in which the Supreme Court held that by correspondence the operating company was engaged in interstate commerce.

While there has been repeated explanation by those sponsoring the bill in the Senate that it will affect only interstate and will not deal with intrastate commerce, we should not be misled as to just what constitutes interstate commerce, since an operating company, operating in a single State, is transacting business in interstate commerce when it merely writes letters to a holding company.

In the light of our experience with Government operation, we know that it has always been more costly than operation by private enterprise, and it does not take another costly experiment to teach us. No project for the generation, distribution, and sale of power operated by the Government can possibly be as efficient as the same project under private operation.

For an example of Government operation, remember the railroads under Federal control. History shows us that the Government management of the railroads was inefficient, and all of us remember that the railroads were wretchedly conducted; that money was spent and wasted with a prodigality which nothing can defend. During the time in which the Government undertook to manage the railroads, they sustained, despite a generous increase in freight rates, a loss of over a million dollars a day, and the total payments out of the Treasury to support the railroads reached the enormous sum of one and three-quarters billions of dollars. There was universal dissatisfaction with the Government management, and it was a just dissatisfaction. The experiment failed.

The importance of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill does not rest alone with the abolition of the holding company or with the operation of the electric and gas utility companies by the Federal Government. This is the first step on the part of the Federal Government toward the control of all public utilities. If, without due consideration of the result of this step, we place in the hands of the board or commission established with congressional authority to write the law and enforce it, or its equivalent, the operation of gas and electric utilities throughout the United States, we will be called upon at the not too far distant time to bring under Government control all public-utility operations. When we vote on this bill, therefore, we must decide, not only for the present but for the future of all utilities.

When the National Industrial Recovery Act was passed, the Congress agreed to the most extensive transfer of congressional power to an administrative agency ever made. With the N. R. A. the administration hoped to advance recovery by raising wages and thereby the purchasing power of employees and to prevent cutthroat price competition. This is the basis upon which most of the "recovery" program was founded. It was expected that wages would be raised in advance of prices, but the N. R. A. failed to control price advances. By the time the codes had raised wage rates prices had soared so as to offset the pay-roll gains. This promoted scarcity rather than abundance, and aggravated, instead of corrected, many of the worst internal maladjustments, which materially retarded the revival of the construction and capital goods industries. The experiment, as we all know, proved an utter failure and was struggling to draw its last gasps when the Supreme Court branded it unconstitutional. The evils which grew up under the N. R. A. are without number. By the passage of the act the President of the United States was made a dictator over industry. The law governing industry was written within the administration and not by the Congress, but that again was the fault of the Congress in delegating its power.

Altogether the N. R. A. regimented the American people and violated their liberties; it increased production costs and reduced consumption; it retarded rather than fostered recovery; it encouraged industrial strife but failed to improve the lot of labor and it was as casually and frequently disregarded as the prohibition law. The codes resulted in injustice, particularly to the small manufacturer or businessman, favoritism, oppression of small businesses and the growth of monopolies. If the Federal Government is going to supervise industry there must be power to define the jurisdictional limits of industries and trades, just as there is a definiteness in the jurisdictional lines of States.

What I am endeavoring to point out is the injustice we have done the American people by the enactment of this and other laws which are not only unconstitutional but which retard rather than foster recovery. It is high time that the Congress should give deep study to the laws, it passes and think seriously of the constitutionality of their provisions. The passage of unconstitutional laws leads to endless litigation and confusion and great expense to all litigants concerned. What we need is recovery not reform. Reform must come slowly, carefully, cautiously. We owe the electors who sent us here the best that we can give them and we should be able to go before them at election and at all other times and tell them that we gave our support to only those measures which after careful consideration we were assured for the public good. Are we going to continue to pass Federal laws which, socialistic in their character, take from the man who had struggled and put aside for his old age, his life earnings, his security? I know of no human right which is dearer to civilized man than the right to work for, acquire and keep for his own, property. Have we in a republic any constitutional authority to take from our citizens that which they have earned by energy, intelligence, thrift, tenacity of purpose and enterprise? By doing so we stifle initiative and creative energies. In days gone by man worked for the love of work alone. That is not true today. The majority labor for the monetary remuneration and the job is valued by the salary or the power it commands. We can bring about recovery only when governmental measures supplement and not compete with private enterprise. We cannot bring about a normal or abnormal recovery by the smothering of creative energy by the inflexible might of bureaucracy. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I want to compliment the Appropriations Committee for an item contained in this bill which I believe is of vast interest to the Congress and to the country. Some time ago on the floor of the House in connection with a bill which came over from the Senate we heard a very interesting debate on the possibilities of a round-the-world mail service. An item was included in that Senate bill calling for the appropriation of $2,000,000 for the inauguration of a service between San Francisco, Calif., and Canton, China. At that time the Appropriations Committee informed us that they were not in position to approve such an item because it had never been brought before them by the Post Office Department or by anyone else in the Government service.

At the committee's suggestion the House very wisely rejected the item and it was ultimately stricken from the bill. In the bill we are considering there is contained an item of $1,000,000 for the creation of this trans-Pacific air-mail transportation service. The Department asked for an appropriation of not to exceed $1,800,000 annually, the contract to be let by competitive bidding and the service to be inaugurated with an understanding that it be conducted at regular intervals. The committee reduced the appropriation to $1,000,000, which I feel is enough for the initiation of this service. It is not necessary that the service be increased right away, but it is necessary that the service be instituted.

Mr. Chairman, this service will connect San Francisco, Hawaii, Wake Island, Guam, Manila, and Canton, China. In China it will connect with another service operated by an American company and also a second service operated by a Chinese company which is partly owned by American interests. These two companies in turn will connect up with other lines, which will give the United States virtually a round-the-world service. This is the beginning of a service that will give us a rapid round-the-world air mail transportation system in a short time. Not only that but it offers the United States an opportunity to cultivate a very promising field in China and the other nations of Asia before that field is overdeveloped by competing air-minded nations. Already there is a German line in China. There are English lines in Asia, and it is high time for America to realize that much of the future commerce, mail, passenger, and express business of the world will be carried by airplane. It is time for us to enter this field, to develop its trade possibilities. This is a very important item, and I congratulate the committee for recommending it.

Mr. Chairman, there is another item in this bill that is of interest to those of us who are on the Post Office Committee and that is the item pertaining to the Rural Delivery Service, calling for an increased appropriation of $2,685,000. The reason I mention this appropriation is that there is a possibility that Members of this House will charge this item to the increased equipment allowance which we granted the personnel of the Rural Service when we passed a measure reclassifying salaries in that Service during the last Congress. It is true that the hearings, and perhaps the report on this bill, indicate that this increased appropriation is due to the fact that we increased the equipment pay of the carrier from 4 to 5 cents a mile. It would be true if that was all we did, but that is not exactly the case.

When we passed the bill reclassifying the salaries in the Rural Service we saved the Department approximately $9,200,000 by reducing the wages of the employees of the Rural Service. We did this by extending the standard route from 24 miles to 30 miles and paying the carrier the same wage for carrying the mail over the 30-mile route that we paid him for carrying the mail over the 24-mile route. In addition to that, we reduced the per mile wage of the carrier for all miles in excess of 30 miles from what it was, $30 a mile, to what it has been since the passage of that bill—$20 a mile.

In view of the fact that we have more miles per day than ever before in excess of 30 miles, we are delivering much of our rural mail for $20 per mile, whereas we formerly delivered it for $30 a mile. The record therefore indicates that the bill passed by Congress a year ago permitted the Department to effect a saving of approximately $9,200,000. The equipment allowance was increased from 4 to 5 cents, but by reason of the fact that the Economy Act permitted an additional reduction from 4 cents to 1 cent, there was of necessity an increased appropriation needed. The elimination of the cut in the equipment pay made possible by the Economy Act and the subsequent increase in the equipment allowance from 1 cent to 4 cents and subsequently to 5 cents called for increased appropriations. I want the RECORD to show that the bill which passed the Congress a year ago increased the equipment allowance, and it also effected a saving by reclassifying the salaries and rearranging the method of pay in the rural letter carrier service. Its decreases more than offset its increases.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from New York that the routes are rather long and that these consolidations and extensions make the routes longer than is necessary or wise?

Mr. MEAD. May I say to the gentleman that our committee on a number of occasions considered the matter of limiting the length of rural routes to 60 miles. The present administration of the Post Office Department has indicated a desire to hold all rural routes to 60 miles, but because of difficulties encountered in rearranging routes that are now in excess of 60 miles it was the desire of the Department that no legislation of that kind be reported by our committee. I may say to the gentleman, however, that the rural letter carrier service, by reason of the constantly increasing mileage and the consolidation of routes, the elimination of fourth-class post offices, and the elimination of star routes has saved many millions of dollars.

We are serving more patrons at less cost to the Department than ever before.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the deficiency appropriation carried in this bill on page 9, under the title of the Tariff Commission, and in this connection I call attention to the testimony of the Secretary and the administrative officer of the Tariff Commission in testifying before the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to read several brief extracts, in order not to take up the time of the committee, from their statement found on page 150 of the hearings:

> Surpassing in importance and in volume all other work of the Commission combined has been the Tariff Commission's activities under the Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934.

Then, again—

> Some 31 different committees are dealing with the reciprocal trade negotiation program, special functions, or fields being assigned to each committee.

And, again—

> The highly industrialized and highly competitive European countries present problems far more intricate and difficult, and the staff of the Tariff Commission anticipates a long, busy period as the reciprocal trade negotiation program moves forward.

And, again—

> In effect, the American tariff is today under revision.

I want to repeat this sentence from the administrative officer of the Tariff Commission:

> In effect, the American tariff is today under revision.

May I ask, Mr. Chairman, by what authority is the tariff under revision? Is there any legislation pending in Congress that warrants this statement from an administrative officer? Is there any tariff bill before this House? Is there any tariff measure being considered in the Ways and Means Committee? Not to my knowledge. But the interesting part of this effort, illegally and unconstitutionally to revise the tariff, is in the expense of this revision to the taxpayers.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me finish this expense item and then I shall yield to the gentleman.

The Tariff Commission for the year 1936 asked for the sum of $970,000 and in the breakdown of these figures we find that the estimate for 1935 under item 1, the reciprocal trade agreements amendment of June 12, 1934, to the Tariff Act of 1930, is $374,527, and the estimate for 1936 is $426,753. In other words, nearly 50 percent of the entire cost of the Tariff Commission, in my opinion, is contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

By what authority can the officials of the Tariff Commission say, in effect, that the American tariff is today under revision? The Commission has no right to inaugurate any such revision without reporting to Congress or upon congressional request for information. The reciprocal tariff law is questioned as to its constitutionality, and this question is supported by language in the celebrated decision of the Supreme Court rendered only a few weeks ago.

I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. May I inquire if this is not under the reciprocal tariff paragraph referred to?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, certainly.

Mr. LUNDEEN. And in that connection may I say that I voted against that reciprocal tariff act?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; and I appreciate the gentleman's good judgment in doing so, because he voted to support the Constitution, while those who put the reciprocal tariff act on the statute books did just the reverse. I put this entire proposition up to our distinguished former colleague here, the present Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, as to the constitutionality of that act when he advocated adoption of his hobby before the Ways and Means Committee. I admire a man with a hobby, and a hobby is a splendid thing to ride, but it is mighty expensive to the taxpayers of the country when, in order to carry out the provisions of such an act, they have to put up $426,000 in order to get estimates that they have no constitutional right to ask for. Further than this, this hobby of the Secretary of State means injury and damage to the industries of this country. I contend this is a hobby he should keep off of, and the voters of this country will aid him next year in getting off of this hobby.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman know of any way the constitutionality of the reciprocal trade agreements law may be tested in the courts?

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, that is a matter of procedure that must be put up to the individuals involved. As I understand it, the Supreme Court takes up cases from the lower courts where an injury, financial or otherwise, has been shown against an industry or against a firm. This was exactly the basis of the "chicken" decision of a few weeks ago; and in the gentleman's own case, if an agreement is entered into with Canada, with respect to the tariff rate on lumber which affects the industries of the Pacific coast, I hope some of the gentleman's good manufacturers of shingles and lumber out there will bring the matter to the Court here and test out this constitutional question.

Mr. MOTT. If the tariff is interfered with, it will probably ruin the lumber industry of the Pacific coast.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman and his friends and his constituents are entitled to the protection of the Court.

Mr. MOTT. The trouble is to get the question before the Court.

Mr. TREADWAY. I hope they will pursue the policy followed by the chicken man in Brooklyn in bringing the case into the courts and in getting a decision that will be beneficial to everyone concerned.

Mr. MOTT. Many people interested in the lumber industry have inquired about the matter. In case a tariff agreement is negotiated with Canada and the tariff on lumber taken off, they know of no way at present whereby they can get the matter into the courts. I am looking into the question now and I was wondering if the gentleman had any information on the subject.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am pleased the gentleman is interested in the matter.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What would the gentleman think of taking the tariff entirely out of politics by having a permanent Tariff Commission with the members appointed for life and removable only on charges, and paying them $40,000 a year, so that we may regulate the matter of a tariff on its merits?

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to know who is going to have the selection of the members of the board before I would agree to that program.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In this way we would take it out of politics so that it would no longer be a football of politics.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is not in politics now and this kind of procedure is destroying the industries of this country in a manner which I believe is unconstitutional, and the Secretary of State should not have come before the Congress and urged this reciprocal-tariff proposition.

Mr. MILLARD. Would the gentleman from New York approve of a nonpartisan Tariff Commission?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Positively.

Mr. TREADWAY. We had one once and the Democrats threw it out the window.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I would favor a nonpartisan commission with full power to act on each individual item on its merits, and until we do provide for this method, the tariff will never be taken out of politics and we will never get the right kind of a tariff.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have introduced a bill to repeal the Reciprocal Tariff Act, and so has my good friend from Nevada, Mr. SCRUGHAM. That confirms the statement that my friend from New York, Mr. FITZPATRICK, made, that it is nonpartisan. It is a nonpartisan matter or a bipartisan matter. This particular subject of reciprocal tariffs has not been a political football, as it has only been on the statute books for a short time.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. Does my colleague know that on the ocean rates from Boston, Baltimore, and New York shipping to Europe costs three times as much as the shipping from Europe here on the same ship. These are the rates that the North Atlantic has established, and we cannot make such restrictions.

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly such discrimination against American shipping is very injurious.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts has had trouble with Japan, and he is very sensitive on the tariff question.

Mr. TREADWAY. We are all having trouble with Japan and some other countries, for they are making goods so cheaply they are putting us out of business. Reciprocal tariff will do the part.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman knows that I am for protection.

Mr. TREADWAY. I know that. The gentleman was born in a section where brains count. The gentleman from New York was born in the next town to the one where I first saw the light.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the question of man's being born with brains is sectional?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, no. We are glad to spare some for the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, as to the statement I have made about reciprocal tariffs, I want to read a few lines from the decision in the Poultry case:

> The Constitution provides that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives" (art. I, sec. 1). And the Congress is authorized "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" its general powers (art. I, sec. 8, par. 18). The Congress is not permitted to abdicate or to transfer to others the essential legislative functions with which it is thus vested.

That is exactly what we have done in the Reciprocal Tariff Act. We have transferred and abdicated our powers to the executive branch to do with as it sees fit. Further the Court said:

> But Congress cannot delegate legislative powers to the President to exercise an unfettered discretion to make whatever laws he thinks may be needed or advisable for the rehabilitation and expansion of trade or industry.

Could there be anything more direct and positive in statement than that reference in the decision of the Supreme Court about this very subject matter about which I am speaking? Then Mr. Justice Cardozo in his separate opinion said:

This is delegation running riot.

Mr. Chairman, I say that while we are obliged to vote these excessive appropriations and deficiencies carried in this bill, it is time our people knew something about the way the expenditures of the Tariff Commission are practically doubled in order to make investigations that are illegal and unconstitutional. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes. This bill calls for about $225,000,000. The chairman of the committee, Mr. BUCHANAN, has, I think, done a very good job in cutting down the estimates that were sent here from the President, because he tells us today that he has reduced them approximately $132,000,000. There are still some items in the bill where we are appropriating more money than we should, and where I believe Congress should exercise its proper function of cutting them down.

I am going to talk for a moment or two about the Tennessee Valley Authority. That item, to my mind, is still out of line and should be cut more than it has been. The Tennessee Valley Authority is in the hands of three Commissioners and, frankly, I think I can say without much fear of successful contradiction that that Tennessee Valley Authority degenerated from an institution that was supposed to promote flood control and navigation on the Tennessee River to an institution designed for the relief of millionaire gentlemen farmers down in Tennessee. Without any one who had anything to do with the passage of this act knowing anything about it, they have gone ahead and bought a great lot of fancy, high-priced cattle. They went to one auction held by a millionaire farmer named Farrell in Nashville, Tenn., and bought full-blooded, registered Jersey cows, one for $400, one for $900, one for $750, one for $950, one for $600, another one for $600, and a great lot of them for other prices.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. By what authority did they spend money for the purchase of that kind of cattle?

Mr. TABER. I do not think they had any authority.

Mr. SNELL. Then why does the committee appropriate for it?

Mr. TABER. It is not appropriated for here. It is an item that is now under discussion, as I understand it, with the Comptroller General.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. In a moment. The bill for cattle, as I understand it, came to about $5,000, and their business methods were so advanced that they did not pay for them until they were sued for it. They wanted the sheriff's receipt. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. THURSTON. Was it not a part of the relief program to relieve millionaires who have fine herds of cattle around Nashville, Tenn.?

Mr. TABER. It seems to have degenerated into that.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I offer the suggestion to the gentleman that maybe it is good business and it is intended for practice in learning how to milk the country.

Mr. TABER. Oh, they are milking the country all right. Their program runs to $300,000,000, if the country is silly enough to go along with it; but I think the country ought to know the way they are doing business.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What is the reasonable price for a milch cow? Is it not about $75?

Mr. TABER. I know where they could buy first-class registered Jersey cows for $125, and a milch cow for anywhere around $50 to $60. They had some other operations that indicates the capacity of a superbusiness mind.

For instance, they bought a team of mules for $250 and a little while later they sold that team for $170. They bought a team of horses for $325 and in a little while they sold the team of horses for $191, a profitable transaction. They bought a team of brood mares for $425. One died, and they sold the other for $110. They bought three riding horses, and what riding horses have to do with building dams I do not know and you do not know, but they paid $175 apiece for them. One of them was injured and they killed it, and the other two they sold for $100 apiece. They only lost $75 apiece on those two horses.

Mr. MOTT. Riding horses would have just as much to do with the building of a dam as a milch cow, would they not?

Mr. TABER. Well, it is pretty close running. Then, I have here the aircraft yearbook for 1935. Turning to page 105, we see a picture of the T. V. A. Bellanca transport. Below it says:

One of the six planes operated by the United States Tennessee Valley Authority.

In that same yearbook I find on page 108:

Tennessee Valley Authority of Emergency Relief Administration acquired its own planes and used them extensively for transportation during 1934.

Fairchild Aerial Surveys received contracts for aerial photographic mapping of 50,000 square miles in the areas under development. This work was done with the Fairchild 5-lens camera. It is to be completed early in 1935.

They told us that they did not have 6 airplanes, but they only had 3. They told us that they had 1 that was surplus, transferred from the Department of Commerce; 1 that they paid $18,895.58 for, the Bellanca, and $3,665.60 for the Stearman. They spend a good deal of time riding around the country in airplanes at the expense of the T. V. A.

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. EKWALL. Does the gentleman suspect they were delivering the milk from the milch cows by airplanes?

Mr. TABER. It may have been, or perhaps they were delivering fertilizer. [Laughter.]

Mr. COSTELLO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. COSTELLO. Did they use those airplanes in transportation from the Tennessee Valley to other parts of the country or were they used only in traveling from one part of the valley to another?

Mr. TABER. I understand they go outside the range of the valley when they have an errand on which to go.

Mr. COSTELLO. Were they not largely used for photographing the valley itself, in order to have topographical maps of that valley?

Mr. TABER. I do not know but what perhaps I ought to read a word or two of the gentleman's operations. He said he used it for air mapping, but principally transportation. I cannot turn to it just this minute, but he told us of numerous trips he had taken in an airplane because he could save time and do it much quicker.

Of course, it costs a great deal more money to travel that way. When they have facilities like that they do a lot more traveling than they need to.

Mr. COSTELLO. It may be true that they might travel more than they would if the planes were not available, but due to the tremendous distances in the valley it is necessary to cover the space in a short period of time.

Mr. TABER. I think perhaps that is so. Then they told us they had a great lot of automobiles. As I remember it, they spent about $450,000 on automobiles. Then they also hired automobiles to the tune of $90,000. We were interested in the extent into which they were going into industrial development. Mr. BACON asked the question on page 557 of the hearings:

Do you want industry to come in at all?

Dr. MORGAN. This is a part of a national policy and not a local matter. If the State were doing this, it would be perfectly proper or legal anyway to go out and get industries to come in here. It is our policy not to violate old-line methods of chambers of commerce in stealing industries from other localities.

I have before me a letter from the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, dated March 22, 1935, which says:

In late June or early July of 1934 Mr. F. Woods Beekman, who described himself as the assistant personnel director of the Tennessee Valley Authority, called on me to secure the names of local persons to act either as industrial commissioner for the T. V. A. or assistants to the industrial commissioner, whose duties were to be the solicitation of industries for the T. V. A. The implication was that while the T. V. A. had no expectation that a large factory would move bodily to Tennessee, as it expanded its facilities it would expand the power zone of the T. V. A.

Now, it is perfectly apparent that those people have been sending out solicitors to get people to move down there. To my mind, that is not the proper function of that organization.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Whether the T. V. A. sends out invitations for industry to come there, will not the effect be, if cheap power is developed with the taxpayers' money, that it will attract industries there?

Mr. TABER. It would be, of course, as long as they go ahead with the program in mind. As I understand it, the immediate program that they have in mind, representing $192,900,000, according to their own testimony on page 587, will only yield in gross revenue from the sale of power $5,000,000. That would be, without charging any depreciation, about 2½ percent on the money that has been invested by the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. SHORT. If the Tennessee Valley Authority can take Federal funds out of the Treasury in Washington—that is, taxes paid by the people in the gentleman's district in New York and people in my district in Missouri—and generate hydroelectric power in the Tennessee Valley to put out of existence existing companies already there, what is there to prevent the Federal Government from going out to St. Louis and building many shoe factories to put out of existence the Hamilton Brown Shoe Co., the International Shoe Co., and other companies?

Mr. TABER. Nothing, unless the Supreme Court shall stop it or this Congress shall have sense enough to put the brakes on and stop that kind of doings.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. FOCHT. For many years we were all appealed to to favor this proposition. In the ramifications of expenditures, does the gentleman not find anything in the shape of compensation in the shape of nitrates that are to be produced there?

Mr. TABER. They claim that we are developing a type of nitrate which is requiring for its development 50 percent of the power of the Wilson Dam. The Wilson Dam a year ago produced net revenue, according to the tables that they gave us, of $713,000. They tell us that this year it is only going to produce revenue of $136,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman states they are developing a new type of fertilizer. Is it the idea that after the method of processing is perfected that it will be passed on to some private concern?

Mr. TABER. That is what was said by Dr. Morgan, the agricultural doctor—there are two Dr. Morgans. I do not know anything about the program, but that is what he told us.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That the process will be passed on to private concerns?

Mr. TABER. It will be made public for anybody in the United States to use in the manufacture of fertilizer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will there be any method whereby the Government will control the capitalization of the process worked out by the taxpayers' money?

Mr. TABER. I know nothing about that.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I take it the gentleman is opposed to the development of the Tennessee Valley.

Mr. TABER. I am opposed to the entire performance that has been going on there. I am opposed to going ahead with any more dams than are now built until we see what happens. As I understand it, the dams that have already been built will stop most of the damage from floods. There is no market for the power at present and there is very little market at any time. These people with the "highfalutin" ideas have not even considered power construction along with the dam construction on the last two dams they are building. I think we ought to stop right where we are and not go further until we see what happens.

I do not believe in the Government paying 2 cents to produce electricity and selling it for 1 cent. I think if we are going to do any business, we ought to do it in the right way; and, anyway, I do not believe in the Government engaging in private business.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If the gentleman will yield further, does not the gentleman think that when we need to create jobs it is a good thing to develop the resources of America?

Mr. TABER. This does not create any jobs to speak of. The cost of creating one job runs into $4,000 or $5,000, as I remember the figures, but I will put the exact figures in the RECORD. If we want to create jobs, the proper way is by giving private industry a chance to recover. [Applause.] Then there will be plenty of jobs.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. At what stage of the reading of the bill will it be proper to offer amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. This being an appropriation bill, it will be read by paragraphs and not by sections. It will be in order to offer an amendment at the end of the reading of any paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Office Building: For an additional amount for maintenance, including the same objects specified under this head in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1935, $5,000.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall speak as closely as I can to the amendment. I know you will be interested, and I hope you always are when I speak, because I am not like the man who made a speech and introduced himself by saying, "One good thing about this speech, I am the last man on the program, and there won't be anything worse to follow." I cannot tell what is going to happen later this afternoon.

Just to illustrate how small the world is, on yesterday afternoon we heard read in this House a message in which the President gave us some notice of what is going to happen to those of us who happen to be millionaires. As an indication of how universal such thoughts may be, my friend FLETCHER, from Ohio, is a very close friend of an author in my home county, a man also well known to former Speaker Rainey and the late William Jennings Bryan, all four being Chautauqua lecturers of national note. The author, Lee Francis Lybarger, of Union County, Pa., I refer to, has written a book entitled "The Big National Gamble." I say to you now that the system proposed by the President yesterday was drawn from this book, first printed last January. This shows how universal the question is, and also that even the White House may draw knowledge from my own county, from this Chautauqua lecturer, Professor Lybarger, brilliant orator, scholar, and philosopher. The President did well in selecting the theories of Professor Lybarger as his guide, although I am in hearty disagreement with most of the heresy enunciated by both.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

For payment to Samuel Robinson, William Madden, Preston L. George, and William S. Houston, messengers on night duty during the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, $900 each; in all, $3,600, to be paid from the appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania: Page 4, line 13, after the word "Houston", insert "Oscar W. Eady, Michael Kostick, Vincent G. Andrews, Daniel O'Connell, Walter Stewart, Philip A. McCall, and William S. Smith, messengers on duty during the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, $900 each; in all, $9,900."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Is this not an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; this is an appropriation bill.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Is it not proper, then, to offer this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order against the amendment that there is no authorization for it. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION

Salaries and expenses: For an additional amount for salaries and expenses for the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, including the same objects specified under this head in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1928, $1.25.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CARLSON moves to amend H. R. 8554, page 6, by inserting a new paragraph following line 6, entitled "Federal Trade Commission":

"For payment to Mrs. William E. Humphrey, or executor of the estate of William E. Humphrey, $3,017 amount due as salary at time of his death as member of Federal Trade Commission."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is new legislation in that the judgment has not been certified according to law.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order. This is a judgment against our Government which is at present pending in the Court of Claims, and the amendment, in my opinion, is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the judgment been certified to Congress?

Mr. CARLSON. It has not, but it will be in a short time. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; I insist upon the point of order. I think all appropriations of money out of the Federal Treasury should be by regular, systematic methods. When a final judgment has been rendered against the Government by any court, it should be certified to the Congress so that we will have the certified record of the judgment and not depend on what this man says or what that man says, and, as a matter of fact, that is what the law requires. I insist that all money be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States according to law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, we are all familiar with the Supreme Court decision in this matter, and there is no question what the outcome will be. This appropriation will be allowed in the next session of Congress without doubt, and I believe it should be made at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would suggest to the gentleman that he get the certification of the judgment in the regular way sent to the Senate when this bill comes up for consideration over there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Under the law, judgments have to be certified to the Congress before an appropriation is made; therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

National Training School for Boys, contract: For an additional amount of care and maintenance of boys committed to the National Training School for Boys by the courts of the District of Columbia under a contract made by the Board of Public Welfare with the authorities of such school for the following fiscal years:
For 1934, $12,590.19;
1935, $60,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 15, line 14, strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "for."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, there are two "ofs" in that line.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I refer to the first one.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For an additional amount for contingent expenses of the Department of the Interior, fiscal year 1935, including the same objects specified under this head in the Department of the Interior Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, fiscal years 1935 and 1936, $5,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 24, line 15, after the word "Interior", strike out the word "fiscal", and in line 16 strike out the words "year 1935."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing and binding: For an additional amount for printing and binding for the Bureau of Mines, fiscal years 1935 and 1936, $8,000.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal of time consumed this afternoon in what I assumed at the time was a well-organized filibuster. I should like to know what happened to the filibuster.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman made reference to me. I have not filibustered. I thought earlier this afternoon we on this side were not being used properly, and I resented it then and I will resent it again, but that had nothing to do with a filibuster.

Mr. BOILEAU. I did not refer to the gentleman himself.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, have we a mediator whom we could send over to the other side of the aisle to conciliate and get this domestic trouble over there adjusted?

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, as I stated, a good deal of time was consumed needlessly this afternoon in what I thought was a well-organized filibuster. I cast no reflection upon any gentleman in making this statement. In view of the fact we have wasted a good deal of time, and in view of the fact that apparently there are no controversial matters in this bill, as it is being read scientifically page after page so rapidly that no Member can possibly know what is being read, and I do not reflect on the Clerk, I ask unanimous consent at this time, in the hope of being able to reclaim some of the wasted time, that the bill may be considered as read, and that amendments may be offered to any part of the bill at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts objected.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I do not see the necessity for reading the bill in this manner. If it is the desire that we adequately consider the bill, I assume it would be possible to put the matter over until some other day or else have a quorum here for the consideration of the bill. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will reconsider his objection to the request which I made, because I assure him that the request was made in order to expedite matters and with no thought of depriving any Member of the right to offer amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Wisconsin knows that there were several others objected in addition to myself. May I ask the gentleman if he does not think that Members of the House have a right to offer amendments, or would he deprive them of that privilege?

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman did not understand my request. This is not a personal matter with me. I simply asked that the bill be considered as read and that all Members may have the opportunity to offer amendments to any part of the bill, thus doing away with the reading of the same. It is being read in such a way that we certainly cannot hope to follow its reading, and I admit that this is a practice that has been well established in the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If it has been well established, then the gentleman does not approve of it, if he is a progressive.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am perfectly willing that the Members should have adequate opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. During this time we could have finished reading the bill by reading it scientifically. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Perhaps we could, but we have not been going as rapidly as I should like.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman from Wisconsin certainly is not filibustering.

Mr. BOILEAU. Not at all. In view of the fact there are apparent differences between the majority party and the Republican Party in which the Progressives and Farmer-Laborites have no part, I thought it perhaps would not be inadvisable for us to show some disapproval of this general procedure. As a matter of fact, I may state that some of us who are neither Republicans nor Democrats, have been considering the advisability of voicing our protest by continuing the procedure a little longer, but I shall not make any such effort now.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. If we are operating under a rule cutting off general debate, what is the use of having such a rule if we are going to continue to allow general debate?

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For an additional amount for the maintenance and operation of Freedmen's Hospital, fiscal year 1935, including the same objects specified under this head in the Department of the Interior Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1935, fiscal years 1935 and 1936, $4,000, of which amount one-half shall be chargeable to the District of Columbia and paid in like manner as other appropriations of the District of Columbia are paid.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct the text of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 26, line 25, strike out the words "fiscal year 1935."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans., $22,000.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOCHT: On page 31, after line 2, insert: "Northeastern Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pa., $200,000 for the erection of suitable homes for the accommodation of the officials and associate directing heads of that institution, the sites to be selected by the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, United States Department of Justice."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not authorized by law and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. FOCHT. I may say, Mr. Chairman, the amendment is similar in character and exactly in line with the other appropriations for the other penitentiaries.

Mr. BLANTON. But there is no law authorizing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses, Emergency Banking, Gold Reserve, and Silver Purchase Acts: The unobligated balance of the appropriation of $2,000,000 for "National Banking Emergency, Act March 9, 1933", contained in the Emergency Banking Act, approved March 9, 1933, and the unobligated balance of the appropriation of $4,500,000 for "Expenses, Emergency Banking, Gold Reserve, and Silver Purchase Acts, 1934 and 1935", contained in the Emergency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, approved June 19, 1934, are hereby consolidated, effective July 1, 1936, into an appropriation account, "Expenses, Emergency Banking, Gold Reserve, and Silver Purchase Acts", to remain available until June 30, 1936, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for any purpose in connection with the carrying out of the provisions of the Emergency Banking Act, approved March 9, 1933 (48 Stat. 1), the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, approved January 30, 1934 (48 Stat. 337), the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1178), any Executive orders, proclamations, and regulations issued under the foregoing acts, and section 3653 of the Revised Statutes, including costs of transportation, insurance, and protection of gold coin, gold bullion, and gold certificates transferred to Federal Reserve banks and branches, United States mints and assay offices, and the Treasury, after March 9, 1933, losses sustained by Federal Reserve banks due to abrasion of gold coin, and reimbursement to Federal Reserve banks and branches for expenses incurred by them in carrying out instructions issued by the Secretary of the Treasury after March 4, 1933.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct the language of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 41, line 14, strike out "1936" and insert in lieu thereof "1935."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read down to and including line 12, on page 47.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8554, the deficiency appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BUCK, today, on account of important business.

To Mr. POLK, for 1 week, on account of important business.

To Mr. OLIVER, for the rest of the week, on account of illness.

To Mr. STEAGALL, account of death in family.

MONUMENT TO GROVER CLEVELAND

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 147, authorizing the erection of a monument to Grover Cleveland in Washington, D. C., with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 6 and 7, strike out "Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital" and insert "The National Park Service, Department of the Interior."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, blind persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, Mr. CULLEN, Mr. TREADWAY, and Mr. BACHARACH.

WHAT I WOULD DO IF I WERE PRESIDENT

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a small quotation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, Young America, a news weekly for youth, some time ago offered a free trip and a week's stay in Washington, D. C., to the winners in a contest for writing the two best essays on What I Would Do If I Were President. Thousands of entries poured in for this competition, which was opened to all boys and girls under 16 years of age. The 10 essays from each division of the United States which were considered the most meritorious by the editors were submitted to a final jury consisting of Arthur Brisbane, Walter Lippmann, and Henry R. Luce for final judgment. The winners in the final contest were Master Gordon B. McLendon, 14, of Idabel, Okla., and Margy Lazarus, 12, of Brooklyn, N. Y. I am proud to say that Gordon McLendon comes from my district and his prize-winning essay is as follows:

If I were President, I would encourage Congress to conclude its labors and return home. Business hardly knows what to expect while the legislative mills are grinding.

I would not worry about balancing the National Budget. This is impossible in the face of such heavy Federal expenditures. This can be taken care of when the recovery program is more advanced.

I would secure the bonus bill enactment with a provision for $1,000,000,000 for its financing to be paid by issuance of silver certificates, thus causing slight but controlled inflation. This would add impetus to national recovery.

I would encourage foreign trade with the United States through permanent representatives stationed abroad.

Stamp out the dole as it is un-American.

Stay out of the World Court, League of Nations, and avoid foreign entanglements.

Stop squandering public moneys on dredging unnavigable rivers and useless attempts to grow forests on barren plains.

Stop making Federal laws that encroach upon State rights.

Would not require taxes on incomes of less than $5,000 but would increase taxes on incomes and inheritances in the higher brackets.

Grant loans to infant aircraft manufacturers and transport companies, slightly increase our standing Army, and encouragement of National Guard training.

Maintain navy comparable to the navies of other great powers.

With these things accomplished the United States would gain the admiration of the civilized world and result in a happy, prosperous, and contented people.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 314. An act for the relief of Vito Valentino; and

S. 1052. An act for the relief of the Washington Post Co.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 59. An act to create a national memorial military park at and in the vicinity of Kennesaw Mountain in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 2739. An act to extend further time for naturalization to alien veterans of the World War under the act approved May 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 165), to extend the same privileges to certain veterans of countries allied with the United States during the World War, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, June 21, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE

FRIDAY, JUNE 21, 1935

(Legislative day of Monday, May 13, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Thursday, June 20, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) authorizing the erection of a monument to Grover Cleveland in Washington, D. C.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, blind persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, Mr. CULLEN, Mr. TREADWAY, and Mr. BACHARACH were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 314. An act for the relief of Vito Valentino;

S. 1052. An act for the relief of The Washington Post Co.; and

H. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution authorizing the erection of a monument to Grover Cleveland in Washington, D. C.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, LIBRARY OF CONGRESS (S. DOC. NO. 74)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation (relative to books for the adult blind) for the legislative establishment, and pertaining to the Library of Congress, fiscal year 1936, in the sum of $75,000, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, NATIONAL CAPITAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 73)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, amounting to $800,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR (S. DOC. NO. 72)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting two supplemental estimates of appropriations (pertaining to legislative expenses, Territory of Alaska, 1935, and the temporary government for the Virgin Islands, 1936) for the Department of the Interior, fiscal year 1935, $3,050, and for the fiscal year 1936, $40,000; in all, $43,500, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION (S. DOC. NO. 75)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental (revised) estimate of appropriation for the Department of the Interior, fiscal year 1936, in the amount of $600,000 (being a substitute for the estimate transmitted to Congress under date of May 15, 1935, and printed in H. Doc. No. 186, 74th Cong.), to carry out the provisions of law to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas in 1921 the States of New York and New Jersey entered into a compact whereby they undertook the future planning and development of the port of New York and created the Port of New York Authority as their joint agent and trustee to provide adequate highway and railway communication within the port of New York district; and

Whereas in 1922, with the approval of Congress, the two States adopted a comprehensive plan for the development of the port of New York, with particular regard to railroad facilities and improvements; and

Whereas in 1931, by chapter 47, Laws of New York, 1931, and chapter 4, Laws of New Jersey, 1931, the two States declared and agreed that the vehicular traffic movement across the waters between the States of New York and New Jersey constituted a general movement of traffic, and further agreed that the construction, maintenance, operation, and control of all such bridges and tunnels heretofore and hereafter authorized by the two States should be unified under the Port Authority; and

Whereas the Port Authority is now operating the George Washington Bridge and the Holland Tunnel, constructed at an aggregate cost of approximately $95,000,000, and is engaged in the construction of the Midtown Hudson Tunnel at a cost of approximately $38,000,000, which said facility was included in the comprehensive program of public works pursuant to the National Industrial Recovery Act, and is now in the course of construction; and

Whereas in 1890 the North River Bridge Co. procured a corporate charter from Congress authorizing it to construct a railroad and vehicular bridge across the Hudson River between the State of New Jersey and the city of New York, and to build freight terminals in connection therewith; and

Whereas the said company originally planned to build such bridge in Hoboken, N. J., but has revised and altered its plans and now intends to build it in the vicinity of Fifty-seventh Street and to a corresponding point over the Hudson River in the State of New Jersey; and

Whereas although 45 years have elapsed, such bridge has not been constructed and the plans therefor are still on paper and the two States have since developed and are effectuating a railroad and vehicular program in the port district; and

Whereas there is not and will not for many years to come be sufficient vehicular traffic across the Hudson River in the mid-Manhattan area to justify the construction of both the Midtown Hudson Tunnel and the proposed Fifty-seventh Street bridge; and

Whereas the proposed bridge is in direct conflict with all elements of the carefully conceived plans of the two States for the solution of the railroad and vehicular-communication problems in the port of New York district, and tends to place these plans and the interests of the two States in jeopardy and is contrary to sound Federal and State policy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby memorialized and requested to repeal the charter of the North River Bridge Co., which was granted by act of Congress of the United States (ch. 669, 1889–90, 51st Cong., and Public Act No. 350, 67th Cong., 1922); and

That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the State of New York.

Whereas the unimproved portion of the Champlain and Erie Canals, in its present condition, is objectionable to a large number of the residents of the city of Cohoes; and

Whereas such portion of the canal is no longer used for navigation purposes; and

Whereas it is desirable that such canal or waterway be changed to a subterranean stream or channel from a point known as "Waste Weir No. 1" of the old Champlain Canal to the northerly boundary of the city of Cohoes, thus preserving any useful features that might be feasible for water power or other purposes; and

Whereas such useful and necessary work would be of great benefit to the city of Cohoes and the State at large and would provide unemployment relief: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Federal Public Works Administration be and respectfully is hereby memorialized to include in the contemplated public-works project the aforesaid improvement; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That such administration be and is hereby respectfully requested to allocate such funds to complete this project; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, to members of the Public Works Administration, and to each Member of Congress of the United States Senate elected from the State of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has imposed a tax upon all sales of gasoline; and

Whereas the State of New York and the other several States of the United States have already imposed taxes upon such sales; and

Whereas the Federal tax on such sales is untimely and prohibitive and, coupled with the respective State taxes on such sales, places a burden upon the users of gasoline beyond that which they should carry and beyond that which the traffic can legitimately bear; and

Whereas the taxation of sales of gasoline should properly be left to the exclusive use of the States as a means of providing funds for road construction and maintenance and unemployment relief projects: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to abolish the Federal gasoline sales tax and to surrender to the States exclusively the power to tax such sales in the future; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the United States Senate, and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of New York, and that the latter be urged to use their best offices to procure the enactment of such legislation as will accomplish the purposes of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration:

Whereas the rigid enforcement of our Federal immigration laws is, and has been in the past, the cause of separating persons lawfully residing in the United States from their wives and families by denying to such wives and families entrance into this country, and

Whereas such separation of families strikes at the very foundation of our social, economic, and political structure and tends to disrupt our ideals of home and family life and break down its influence upon our national existence, and

Whereas such a situation necessitates the separate maintenance of families outside the United States by such persons lawfully residing in this country, resulting in the annual exportation of large sums of money earned in the United States to foreign countries for such support and maintenance: Now be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be and it hereby is respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to humanize the immigration laws of the United States and to provide for the reuniting of such persons and their families; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of the United States Senate, and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of New York and that the latter be urged to use their best offices to procure the enactment of such legislation as will accomplish the purposes of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Whereas George S. Ward, a former member of the Army Medical Corps, recently has been a needy case in a hospital within the State of New York; and

Whereas the physical disability from which the said George S. Ward has suffered is reported to have directly resulted from his voluntarily submitting to medical experiments under the direction of Army medical officers; and

Whereas the said George S. Ward has been publicly credited with having been instrumental in eliminating the scourge of typhoid fever; and

Whereas his impairment in health resulting from such experiment has contributed to the cause of his present financial distress to the extent that he has become in part dependent upon the public for support; and

Whereas certain legislation is now pending in the Congress of the United States designed to compensate the said George S. Ward for his great courage and self-sacrifice in the cause of public health: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and hereby is, respectfully memorialized to enact such legislation to provide a suitable pension to the said public benefactor; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of the Senate, and to each Member of Congress and United States Senator elected from the State of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas a resolution providing for the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11 of each year as "General Pulaski's Memorial Day" for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski is now pending in the present session of the United States Congress; and

Whereas the 11th day of October, 1779, is the date in American history of the heroic death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, who died from wounds received on October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savannah, Ga.; and

Whereas the States of Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and other States of the Union, through legislative enactment designated October 11 of each year as "General Pulaski's Memorial Day"; and

Whereas it is fitting that the recurring anniversary of this day be commemorated with suitable patriotic and public exercises in observing and commemorating the heroic death of this great American hero of the Revolutionary War; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has by legislative enactment designated October 11, 1929; October 11, 1931; October 11, 1932; and October 11, 1934, to be General Pulaski's Memorial Day in the United States of America: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of New York—

1. That we hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, the General Pulaski's Memorial Day resolution now pending in the United States Congress.

2. That certified copies of this resolution, properly authenticated, be sent forthwith to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and each of the United States Senators and Representatives from the State of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, which were ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York has previously memorialized the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as will effectively prevent lynching outrages which continue to occur from time to time in some of the Southern and Southwestern States; and

Whereas such legislation is urgently needed to restore in our people respect for law and order; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a bill introduced by Senator COSTIGAN which, in the judgment of the people of the State of New York, will accomplish the desired result: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed the Costigan antilynching bill or other like legislation which will prevent the punishment or destruction of persons accused or suspected of crime in any other way or by any other authority than by due process of law and by a duly constituted court of justice; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of New York, and that the latter be urged to use their best efforts in obtaining the passage of the legislation referred to herein.

Whereas President Franklin D. Roosevelt offered a social-security plan of permanent employment insurance, old-age pensions, and benefits to needy and dependent mothers and children designed to safeguard the average citizen in future periods of depression, and as more fully set forth in his message to Congress on the 17th day of January 1935; and

Whereas pursuant to such message United States Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, of New York, introduced bills in the Congress of the United States seeking to carry out these recommendations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That Congress be memorialized to adopt the aforesaid bills and recommendations as proposed by Senator WAGNER; and be it further Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives and to each Member of Congress and to each Senator elected from the State of New York at Washington, D. C.

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to provide suitable and adequate regulation of the transportation of persons and property in interstate and foreign commerce by motor carriers operating motor vehicles for compensation, by charter, or by contract on the public highways in interstate or foreign commerce; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the United States Senate, and to each Member of Congress elected from New York State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Board of Supervisors of the city and county of Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, requesting the enactment of such legislation as may be necessary not only to authorize the issuance of bonds, but to change and amend certain items in bond issues and the spending of appropriations in connection therewith for the city and county of Honolulu, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Master Bakers Association of Richmond Borough, Staten Island, N. Y., favoring the prompt enactment of legislation repealing the processing tax on flour, and "that the surplus fund of $112,000,000 left after paying the farmer approximately $440,000,000 be returned or refunded to the baking industry", which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Hebrew Mutual Alliance, of New Rochelle, and the board of directors of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society, New York City, both in the State of New York, favoring the enactment of House bill 8163, known as the "Kerr bill", pertaining to the deportation of aliens, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

ATTITUDE OF CANNERS TOWARD A. A. A.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to print a letter from Charles J. Meister, who is president of the Minnesota Canners Association, and therefore speaks for the canners of Minnesota. The letter gives the canners' attitude in reference to the A. A. A. amendments and should have space in the RECORD, thereby bringing to the attention of Congress their just views.

I also ask to print a letter from Guy A. Thomas, chairman of the board of the Commander-Larabee Corporation, of Minneapolis, a lawyer and prominent business man.

I also ask to print a letter from farmer Christ Halvorsen, of Milan, Minn., which speaks for itself and which reinforces Senator HASTINGS' speech made sometime ago in the Senate where he placed in the RECORD letters from farmers all over the country showing the undue influence exercised upon them and their opinions by the Secretary of Agriculture's office and his appointees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BLACK. I object. I may not object at a later time, after I shall have examined the letters and articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. BLACK subsequently withdrew his objection, and the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIRMONT, MINN., May 28, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to take this opportunity of thanking you for the courtesies extended while in Washington last week. It was a pleasure to call on you, and we appreciate very much the attitude you take toward our problems. We thought it policy to put in writing some of the things which we discussed when in your office.

As you remember, our business concerned mainly the amendments to the A. A. A. bill, with special reference to clause 3 of subsection 3, section 4, of H. R. 8052. Under this licenses could be imposed on canners of fruits and vegetables.

The canners have not opposed the A. A. A. program and do not oppose it at present except for the one feature. Our record in the past has been one of cooperation and helpfulness, for when A. A. A. requested the canners to increase the price to the grower this was done to the satisfaction of the A. A. A. Prices each of the last 2 years have increased on canning crops to follow the program which they have set out on making our prices equal to parity. We believe our records show that we have gone even further than was requested in trying to be in line with the program the A. A. A. has set forth.

The canners are different than other lines in that the contract is made with the grower early in the spring which establishes a price that shall be paid for the product when delivery is made. In other words, the canner is taking all of the risk so far as market is concerned, and the only risk the grower actually takes is the one on whether or not he produces a crop.

We believe that the canner should have a voice in deciding whether or not licensing should be resorted to, for the canners themselves have an investment in plants and equipment that equals or exceeds the investment of the grower in the land devoted to canning crops production.

In this bill it would not be possible for the canners to go to court unless they were exceptionally large and well financed, for this procedure is so expensive that they would have to accept whatever was imposed, and would not be able to safeguard their rights. There is also a possibility in this program that through the license feature, which would be regional in its effect, prices might be paid for one crop in some section of the country which were not in line with prices paid in other sections. This would, in effect, make it impossible for certain groups of canners to compete.

We appreciate the time and thought that you have given to our problems, and we would appreciate anything you can do to protect our interests when this proposed legislation comes before you.

Yours very truly,

MINNESOTA CANNERS ASSOCIATION,
CHAS. J. MEISTER, President.

COMMANDER-LARABEE CORPORATION,
Minneapolis, Minn., June 19, 1935.

The Honorable THOMAS D. SCHALL,
The United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have carefully read over the bill which has passed the House relative to the A. A. A. amendments. While I am not an attorney, I have ardently studied the Constitution of the United States—in fact, I have a large copy of it framed in my office for people to read—and if this A. A. A. Act is constitutional from any angle, I miss my guess.

It is simply giving work for a lot of lawyers all over the country to ultimately present claims to the Supreme Court. Put me down on record as saying that if the bill passes the Senate in its present form it will eventually be ruled unconstitutional.

I am surprised that thinking men have given so little study to the Constitution of the United States that they fail to understand that these "if, as, and when" acts that are not positively set for a purpose will not hold water in the final analysis. I do not believe for one minute that you will vote for it in its present form, as you have undoubtedly given a great deal of study to it. But put me down on record regarding the unconstitutionality of the document if it ultimately becomes law.

Regards.

Very truly yours,

GUY A. THOMAS,
Chairman of the Board.

MILAN, MINN., May 26, 1935.

United States Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you again regarding the farmers voting on if we want the crop-control program or not. I told you in my previous letter it was all a fraud; it is all politics. As I told you, the committeemen were instructed to get all the votes—that is, sealed votes from May 15 till the 25th—so you see they got all the votes that they knew to be in favor of this program. But the biggest swindle was when myself and my neighbor went to vote at the appointed place to vote it was not a soul there to take our votes. We waited 30 minutes and the door was locked. That is a big swindle game by Wallace's politics. We sure hope that you will fight this program to the last ditch, because the Democrats want to import agricultural products.

Very truly yours,

CHRIST HALVORSON.

P. S.—I can make a sworn statement that we did not have a chance to vote the 25th.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 148) granting the consent of Congress to the minimum-wage compact ratified by the Legislatures of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 922) thereon.

Mr. BULOW, from the Committee on Civil Service, to which was referred the bill (S. 2806) for the relief of William A. Devine, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 923) thereon.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5393) for the relief of Moses Israel, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 924) thereon.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1632) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by water carriers operating in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 925) thereon.

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8297) to amend so much of the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1921, approved March 1, 1921, as relates to the printing and distribution of a revised edition of Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 926) thereon.

Mr. BLACK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 298) for the relief of Jack Page, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 927) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KEYES:

A bill (S. 3114) for the refund of customs duty paid by Salvatore Lascari on an importation of mosaic paintings for the Moody Currier Art Gallery in Manchester, N. H.; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. MURPHY:

A bill (S. 3115) to amend section 75 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WAGNER:

A bill (S. 3116) to eliminate certain lands from the Craters of the Moon National Monument, Idaho;

A bill (S. 3117) to accept the cession by the State of Arkansas of jurisdiction over all lands now or hereafter included within the Hot Springs National Park, Ark., and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 3118) to provide for the creation of the Perry's Victory and International Peace Memorial National Monument on Put in Bay, South Bass Island, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 3119) to authorize the transfer of the Otter Cliffs Radio Station on Mount Desert Island, in the State of Maine, as an addition to the Acadia National Park, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. ASHURST (by request):

A bill (S. 3120) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain moneys to "Funds of Federal prisoners"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McADOO:

A bill (S. 3121) to vest in the Register of Copyrights the registration of copyright prints and labels; to the Committee on Patents.

AMENDMENT TO MERCHANT-MARINE BILL

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2582) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL

Mr. WHITE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN TAXES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. ROBINSON (for Mr. POPE) submitted an amendment pertaining to a tax on dressed or dyed furs, intended to be proposed by Mr. POPE to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 324) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 324) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the joint resolution, to insert the following:

"That paragraph 8 of section 602, Revenue Act of 1934, is hereby amended by striking out the words 'whale oil (except sperm oil)', and by adding after the words 'marine animal oils' the words 'except whale and sperm oil.'"

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES—REPRINT OF BILL

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to have a reprint made of the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, showing the amendments of the House of Representatives numbered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On June 15, 1935:

S. 209. An act for the relief of Carmine Sforza;

S. 557. An act for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States and for the settlement of individual claims approved by the War Department;

S. 927. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to give war-time rank to retired officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and/or Coast Guard of the United States", approved June 21, 1930, so as to give class B officers of the Army benefits of such act; and

S. 2029. An act to authorize naval and Marine Corps service of Army officers to be included in computing dates of retirement.

On June 17, 1935:

S. 410. An act to provide fees to be charged by the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

S. 2100. An act to amend an act of Congress entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended, by adding three new sections to be numbered 802 (a), 802 (b), and 802 (c), respectively.

On June 19, 1935:

S. 2591. An act for the relief of Lyman C. Drake; and

S. 2688. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the manner in which property shall be sold under orders and decrees of any United States courts", approved March 3, 1893, as amended.

On June 20, 1935:

S. 380. An act to reserve 80 acres on the public domain for the use and benefit of the Kanosh Band of Indians in the State of Utah;

S. 2131. An act to provide for the establishment of the Big Bend National Park in the State of Texas, and for other purposes;

S. 2597. An act for the relief of Irene de Bruyn Robbins; and

S. J. Res. 42. Joint resolution to amend section 289 of the Criminal Code.

THE PEOPLE AND THE THREATENED CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR VANDENBERG

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have extended in the RECORD a speech made last evening by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] over the National Broadcasting System on the subject "The People and the Threatened Constitution."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow countrymen, the Constitution of the United States once more is a live issue before the American people, because of recent epochal events in the following sequence:

First. The Supreme Court, in a series of unanimous decisions, decided that the Federal Government must keep hands off the internal business of the States; that Congress must quit delegating legislative power to the President and lesser bureaucrats; that the President must release the hand of dictatorship from important functions heretofore usurped; in a word, that the Constitution is something more than a paper napkin at an economic picnic.

Second. The President promptly bowed to the authority of the Constitution as authentically asserted by the Supreme Court. But, in a burst of melancholy gloom he announced that this curb will throw America back to the old "horse and buggy" days—meaning anything prior to his own infatuated dispensation—and indicated his belief the Constitution probably needs change. His tone moderated a few days later; but his primary impulse was disclosed in his initial statement when goaded to candor by his initial collision with the Constitution. Manifestly, it must be nullification or amendment if much of the new collectivism shall persist.

Third. The Presidential reference to constitutional amendment immediately took hold, and, as usual where impatience governs, it swiftly graduated into impetuous discussions of broadest possible constitutional reconstruction by others—all proposals aiming, in some fashion, to break down existing constitutional restraints. Again we heard of the old scheme to make Congress supreme over the constitutionality of its own acts. One of our home-vacationing ambassadors even suggested a convention to rewrite the whole charter. Behind these three episodes were 2 years of restless encroachment upon the traditional American mode; 2 years of cumulative power in Washington at the expense of State home-rule and of individual independence; 2 years of congressional surrender to alphabetical commissars who deeply believe the American people need to be regimented by powerful overlords in order to be saved. In addition, there has arisen the new Federal subsidy system under which State rights have been beguiled or bought or bludgeoned into coma.

Thus the Constitution and its traditional Americanism again are live issues. This is good if it leads to truth; incalculably bad if it misleads into treacherous innovations. The people must decide. The Constitution belongs exclusively to them. It cannot be changed by Presidents, courts, or Congresses. But eliminate the Supreme Court and the Constitution no longer is responsive solely to the people. It becomes whatever Congress wants or an ambitious White House dictates. It invites fascism at the "right" or communism at the "left." Today this cannot be true. The Constitution, speaking for the people, is above all government. It is the voice of the sum total of our citizenship. When it yields this character the Republic will join the rest of the world in the ashes of democracy.

It is vital that the people understand that if they desert the Constitution they desert themselves. They fall upon their own sword. "In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this; you must first enable the Government to control the governed, then oblige it to control itself." Hence our Constitution, which none but the people may alter. Hence the Supreme Court to protect this right. The Constitution and the Court are the peoples' sole assurance that this right shall survive. Nothing could be more antiliberal than to strike it down. Justice David Davis, Lincoln's great friend, said:

"The Constitution is a law for rulers and people and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances."

Such a reliance will not be impetuously altered by a rational citizenship which knows the source of its liberty, security, and power. We owe open-minded study to any specific suggestions for constitutional amendments. But we owe a greater study to our history and experience under this great Charter to determine whether change is unavoidably required. Above all, we owe unyielding resistance to any attempts to cheat the Constitution without changing it. Not only the length but the direction of any innovation must be faithfully assessed. When we deal with the Constitution we deal with our birthright.

This does not pretend the Constitution is sacrosanct. This is not a static world. But our constant amazement has been to discover that this charter usually fits our changing needs if we seek patiently to find our answer within its boundary. Those who want to live within it, and have the ability to search the way, usually can reach any legitimate goal. Even the President's favorite Army general—the crack-down genius who lived an imperial hour under the minatory wings of a synthetic eagle—denies any thesis to the contrary. There may come conditions which require change. Federal control of interstate commerce is the most recently asserted cause for such study. But the friendly New York Times said the President's first speech upon this score was "imprudent"; and the friendly Walter Lippmann said: "An amendment to turn over to the National Government omnipotent powers to regulate wages, hours, working conditions, trade practices, and prices would not be ratified by 10 States; would divide and wreck utterly the Democratic Party; would be just about the most superlative piece of idiocy by which any public leader would seek to cut his own throat." I admit a field of legitimate argument at this point. But it is my own view that concentrated Washington authority over the intimate lives and livelihoods of 125,000,000 people scattered across a broad and diversified continent would be both despotic and impractical. In recent memory we put prohibition into the Constitution on the theory these social problems must be answered nationally; then we took it out of the Constitution on the theory that they can't be answered nationally.

But it is not my purpose to argue particular situations. I argue simply that if basic changes must come, they must be by deliberate amendment and not by usurpation no matter how nobly meditated. I argue that the Supreme Court protects the people against usurpation—rather than being the usurper, as often pictured by impatient critics. I also argue the need to discriminate between amendments which change certain boundaries—as in the controversy over interstate commerce—and amendments which would destroy the basic structure of indispensable checks and balances. I question the former. I conclusively reject the latter.

These two types of amendment are again being discussed. One would enlarge Federal powers at the expense of State home rule. This trends toward greater bureaucratic centralization. The other would enlarge legislative and executive powers at the expense of judicial powers. This trends toward the vices of the European system. It invites surrender to an elective despotism. It would be the beginning of the end of ordered liberty. It would surrender popular sovereignty. You can never make a Soviet out of a Supreme Court, hedged on all sides; nor a Bourbon oligarchy out of a Federal judiciary lacking a single affirmative power of enslavement. But you can make any sort of a monster, suited to the ruling passion, out of a legislature or an executive which can be supreme above all things and all men. Even in pursuit of desperately wanted security, let not the warning of Benjamin Franklin be forgotten: "Those who seek security at the expense of liberty will probably lose both."

Impatience with the Constitution and the Supreme Court is no novelty. It is a recurrent phenomenon. We are a volatile people. We are proverbially irked by barriers even when they mark safety zones. But we usually come to our senses before it is too late. Each generation must suffer the same inflammatory declamations. But it has been our blessing that sanity has recuperated in time. Remember this from the Federalist Papers:

"Considerate men should prize whatever tends to fortify the courts; as no man can be sure he may not be tomorrow the victim of a spirit of injustice by which he may be a gainer today."

Thus the great South which originally was chief critic of decisions amplifying Federal power turned to the same Court in reconstruction carpet-bag days and gratefully gained protection against an improper exercise of this same Federal authority carried to excess. Thus, too, when labor unions were shocked in 1908 when the Court found that a labor boycott violated the Sherman Act and proclaimed it an evidence of the servility of the Bench to "big business", they forgot how equally shocked "big business" was in 1897 when the same Court found that "railroad pools" were illegal under the same act. Other examples are legion. Every anticonstitutional communist, when snatched from his soap box, appeals to the Constitution for his ultimate protection.

Nevertheless the Supreme Court—which is to say the articulate Constitution—has been periodically under fire. Ever since the convention of 1787 a zeal frequently more ardent than enlightened has gnawed at the vitals of this dominant charter. The apparent target has been the courts. The real target has been the Constitution itself, because, as James Madison said, the Constitution without the Federal judiciary would be "as much of a mockery as a scabbard put into the hands of a soldier without a sword in it."

At first the quarrel involved the question whether individual States were subservient to Federal authority. This denial was most formidably voiced in the famous Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1789. But for 70 subsequent years it flamed in episodes of serious revolt. Thus Georgia's legislature once ordained that any Federal marshal who executed any Federal process should be "guilty of felony and suffer death, without benefit of clergy, by being hanged." Thus Pennsylvania once broke into armed rebellion; and when Federal courts were threatened with violence if they dared punish the recalcitrants, Judge Bushrod Washington evidenced his sublime courage by adjourning his court to the largest assembly hall in Philadelphia so that, as he said, "Citizens who manifest a deep interest in the results, may witness the administration of the justice of the country, to which all men, great and small, are alike bound to submit."

We are all familiar with South Carolina's nullification ordinance denying all State jurisdiction to the Supreme Court—an emergency which Andrew Jackson served with great courage and nobility. We all know the climax in this particular group of experiences—all linked with the immortal memory of Webster—in which the extreme idea of State rights was liquidated in civil war. Significant of these vicissitudes, it may be noted that so bitter was national resentment over the Court's decision in the Dred Scott fugitive slave case, a bill to place a bust of Chief Justice Taney in the Supreme Court room was lost in Congress amid vindictive anathema. Yet as a heartening evidence of recurrent convalescence in our mental modes, it is more significant that in the cooler-headed days of 1874 the same bill became a law.

Another long line of temporary national revolts has taken the form of efforts to control the Supreme Court's personnel. The great Jefferson himself was not averse to this strategy. One result was a proposal by Hamilton to form the Christian Constitutional Society—which sounds like some of our modern organizations. Another result was to cause Woodrow Wilson to say a century later:

"It was Jefferson's weakness to think it safe for the friends of the people to make a blank paper of the Constitution, but the very gate of revolution for those who were not Democrats."

That is a favorite folly with us all.

Political efforts to impeach judges occasionally occurred when restless administrations sought quick access to balked power. Political efforts to "pack" the Court have been frankly known. But the point is that through it all, the people finally have had the sense to see to it that the Constitution and the Supreme Court survive. I add in this connection that the Supreme Court never yet has rendered a political opinion. The contrary is repeatedly provable. There was never any remote justification for Candidate Roosevelt's slurring and baseless imputation in his speech at Baltimore on October 25, 1932, that the Court was politically subservient to current political administrations.

Another group of clashes has been stirred by exercise of Supreme Court power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. The late Senator Beveridge, writing of Chief Justice Marshall who originally announced the decision vindicating this power, said:

"This supremacy of the written Constitution over statute law, and the authority of the Federal judiciary to act as arbiter in a clash between the two, is wholly and exclusively American. It is America's original contribution to the science of law."

But the contribution has precipitated periodical efforts to escape this greatest of our checks and balances. A successful raid upon the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdication actually succeeded in 1868, but the power was restored 17 years later—another proof that America declines to lose her head indefinitely. There have been many kindred attempts. For example, we faced it, in paraphrase in 1912, when a novel idea proposed "the recall of judicial decisions."

But none of these infringements has taken hold. The power still stands—not the power of nine members of the Supreme Court to defy the President and Congress; but the power of the Constitution to insist that no President or Congress shall exercise any authority not granted to them by the people. It is the vindication of the power of the people.

Those who would strip the Supreme Court of this power have thin justification for their impatience when the whole record is candidly confronted. In 146 years Congress has passed 24,016 public acts, and only 59 have been held unconstitutional. The score is 24,016 to 59! Yet the 59 are magnified into frequent excuse to assault the Court's jurisdiction. The fact that many of these adverse opinions concentrate in our last two innovating years is less reason to attack this jurisdiction than to challenge these immediate trends as being hostile to American institutions. It calls for more rather than less vigilance.

Under lash of temporary disappointment or impatience, we may flare into thoughtless echo of these old demands for revolutionary change. But second thought, though sometimes dangerously belated, never yet has failed to restore a just regard for the amazing constitutional structure which makes us what we are.

I do not argue against exercise of the right to seek constitutional change by the ordained process. I only appeal to the people not to yield lightly to the demands of an impassioned moment, nor to be misled by any specious plea that the Constitution is an instrument of malign repression deserving popular contempt. Truth is exactly otherwise. The Constitution protects the people and preserves to them sole sovereignty. The people victimize themselves if they part with this bulwark.

Congressmen are chosen for 2 years; Presidents for 4; Senators, for 6. They come and go—hailed today, repudiated tomorrow. The Constitution is our one continuous foundation. If it ever becomes similarly transient we shall trade granite for sand as the base of our institutions. This does not suppose a superiority of the judicial to the legislative or executive power. It supposes only that the power of the people is superior to all three. The Constitution is the people. The people never should mediate their own dethronement, or hasten to the defeat of their own authority. They should never embrace constitutional change except as it becomes conclusively plain as the only recourse.

This is not Russia—yet. This is not Europe. This is still the Republic of the United States. Why? Because of the Constitution. Those who smirk at it as a "horse and buggy" antiquity conveniently ignore the shining fact that under it we have builded a larger relative happiness and prosperity than any other nation in history.

For every credential urged in behalf of the new experimental era a thousand benedictions may be cited to the honor and the glory of the traditional American Constitutional institutions. If the time finally has come for change, let the need and the wisdom of it be proven beyond shadow of a reasonable doubt. Let no passing fancy, no fickle emotion, no balked ambition drive us to hasty reprisals upon our greatest asset. The remorse and repentance of tomorrow will be poor consolation for the unthinking errors of today.

It is no idle resurrection of a rhetorical phrase; it is no empty recollection of Lincoln loyalties; it is simply the iron truth that it is the integrity of the Constitution of the United States which alone warrants that "government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth."

ANNIVERSARY OF WEST VIRGINIA'S STATEHOOD—ADDRESS BY SENATOR DICKINSON

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] on West Virginia Day, at Martinsburg, W. Va., June 20, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The occasion on which we are met today has a significance far beyond that of the usual historical anniversary. We are commemorating the entrance of West Virginia into statehood. In a very special sense we are also doing honor to the historic circumstances which are inseparable from that event. For West Virginia was born in the throes of a great conflict fought to determine, once and for all time, that this great Union of States was "one and indissoluble."

The State's origin thus differs from the original colonies on one hand, and the later Commonwealths, like Iowa and Kansas, on the other. The first had enjoyed all the attributes of sovereignty, while the latter were created out of the national domain by act of Congress.

Let us consider for a moment the nature of the momentous decision taken by the citizens of this State 74 years ago today. The choice law, as so often happens, at destiny's crossroads, between loyalties and principles. Separation from the Old Dominion, with all that was implied in common ancestry, mutual traditions and sacrifices, came only when it was no longer possible to reconcile these two great motivating influences in human conduct. It was like the division within a family, or alienation between children and parents.

We know, for example, how much that question of loyalty meant in the case of the great Virginia military leader called upon to decide whether his sword should be tendered to his beloved State or to accept the supreme command of the Armies of a young Nation that had not yet been spiritually fused under the trials of war. For days he pondered where his duty lay, and then obeyed the deepest of all instincts—his heart.

We know how the residents of this western end of that great State, no less conscientious and sincere, chose the opposite course. They embraced principles that seemed to them vital, and determined to support the Union and the Constitution. When the decision was taken by those 39 mountain counties, the vote was 38 to 1 to secede from secession. Theirs, too, was not an easy choice. For we must remember that in those days—the "horse and buggy days", if you will—the locality, the county, the section from which one came were largely independent and intensely proud of it. They had not yet been knit together by a network of highways and railroads to become, as many now seem to believe, mere parts of an economic machine so vast and so intricate that it can be administered only from Washington.

It was Lincoln's imperishable achievement not only to have saved the Union but to have taken those thousands of isolated, scattered communities, bound them together, and breathed into them the spirit of national unity and purpose. Therefore it seems to me particularly fitting that on this West Virginia anniversary we should reaffirm those principles which history will link always with his name, and which now seem placed in as grave jeopardy as when he was called to quell the forces of disunion then threatening the Nation's future.

Lately there was held in the city from which Lincoln set forth for his great task a rather remarkable gathering, a gathering unique in the annals of our history. From a dozen States throughout the Middle West there journeyed to Springfield, Ill., 8,600 earnest, patriotic citizens who paid their own expenses, without benefit of A. A. A. checks, and who were not on Government pay rolls. Let us forget that they were called Republicans, for that is unimportant. Mere partisanship, especially in a year without either elections or candidates, could not bring such an outpouring nor account for the almost religious fervor which animated those proceedings. The spirit that sent those men and women to Springfield is abroad everywhere in America today.

Grave questionings, forebodings of danger facing the Republic are in the air. A sense of uneasiness and uncertainty among business men again retards recovery. These fears have crystallized as the result of the Supreme Court's decision in what General Johnson calls, in his usual attempt at facetious expression, the "sick chicken" case.

You will remember that in this historic verdict the Court unanimously held that chickens raised in Pennsylvania, shipped in interstate commerce to New York, and there resold to a local poultry firm, could not be affected with a national interest. That is, the price paid for poultry dressed in Brooklyn had no relationship to similar activities conducted, let us say, here in West Virginia or in California.

Aside from its legal technicalities that decision rests, as must all such cases, on practical common sense. Of course, its collateral effect was to sweep aside as invalid more than 10,000 pages of restrictions and regulations placed about the conduct of all business under the National Recovery Act.

Yet hardly had the Court pronounced its obituary on a system that was already dead through the sheer impossibility of its enforcement, when from high places came the suggestion that, as a result of this decision, the Constitution once more stood in need of amendment. It may turn out that the President's fateful statement to the newspapermen was no less decisive to his own fortunes than was Senator Stephen A. Douglas' flippant reply to Lincoln in their memorable Freeport debate.

Now the remarkable thing is that the Nation's basic law has been altered no less than 12 times, and always without any feeling of misgiving or peril to our fundamental institutions, such as I have described. What was there in this suggestion to cause ex-Governor Lowden, of Illinois, to declare with all the earnestness at his command: "I measure my words when I say that no crisis so grave as the present has confronted the American people since the Civil War"?

The proposal advanced is to revise the fundamental relationship between the Federal Government and the States by transferring to the central authority all control over the Nation's economic life. In other words, the Constitution is to be changed so drastically that the Bill of Rights, regarded for a century and a half as the ark of our individual liberties, would be virtually annulled. Nor would further amendments ever again be necessary.

They will not be necessary because the essentially Federal character of the American system of government would have been destroyed. The States are reduced, for all practical purposes, to mere units of administration for a centralized national economic policy, such as has been brought about in Germany under the Nazi regime. The vast American continent is to revolve about the White House, Washington as its hub, with the lives and activities of 130,000,000 people regulate under what in radio parlance is called "remote control."

John Marshall, whose great decisions as Chief Justice laid down the lines of our constitutional development, must have foreseen that such an issue would eventually arise when he said:

"No political dreamer would ever be wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States and of compounding the American people into one common mass."

The results that would flow from such action never have been better described than by Mr. Roosevelt himself, who, as Governor of New York, declared:

"It was clear to the framers of our Constitution that the greatest possible liberty of self-government must be given to each State, and that"—note these words—"any national administration attempting to make all the laws for the whole Nation * * * would inevitably result * * * in a dissolution of the Union itself."

The most striking fact about this amazing proposal for the aggrandizement of the Chief Executive is not the bureaucracy so established, into which every worker, every shopkeeper, every small businessman soon would be bound inextricably, or even the constitutional issue that is thus raised. Debate on the purely legal phases of this question will echo from Maine to California; they need not concern us today.

The arresting feature is that this proposal is put forward at the end of 2 years of attempts at exactly such national regimentation, and that it is made apparently on the bland assumption that from the results achieved the program has been an unqualified success. Otherwise why should it be continued? The Supreme Court cannot now be used to alibi the true record which manifestly is one of complete failure.

In this all inclusive economic experiment called the "new deal", the American people have cooperated willingly. No administration ever had more patriotic support. Individual opinion and judgment have been subordinated to the program of providing employment for millions of idle workers, for lessening the burden of private debt, for the relief of agriculture.

Uncomplainingly, the people have submitted to regulation that included everyone from southern peanut growers to Manhattan window cleaners. They have accepted curtailment of foreign trade and the decline in cotton and wheat exports as part of what was called a "balanced" national economy. They have watched the destruction of cattle and hogs, and the rise of the cost of living in the cities. How to relieve want with scarcity may have been beyond their understanding, but still they had faith that perhaps the administration at Washington could accomplish even that miracle.

These activities have been described aptly by H. G. Wells, the eminent English publicist and who certainly is an impartial observer, as resembling an effort to raise temperature by boiling the thermometer. Now we are asked to confirm, by constitutional amendment, the authority by which this has been done. We are asked, furthermore, to make what has been a temporary program to meet an "emergency" into permanent national policy.

Before we embark on any such uncharted course, let us look a little more closely into the reasons which lie behind this proposed destruction of local governments. Let us examine the philosophy of those who could change the American system of balanced powers, carefully and deliberately set up for the preservation of liberty and freedom which it is now the fashion in some quarters to decry, and which would presume to set up a government of supermen in the place of a government of laws.

The necessity for Government aid in meeting the problems of the depression cannot be challenged. The social consequences of universal bankruptcy and distress would have been catastrophic had not the Government extended its own shield of credit and offered succor for its citizens. What is open to question are the methods by which it was sought to reach these objectives.

The attempts to regulate industry through the codes and agriculture under the A. A. A. began on a voluntary basis. Soon it was found that the activities of chiselers—that selfish, unpatriotic 10 percent who place personal advantage over national welfare—nullified this cooperative action.

The administration at Washington, instead of moving to control the chiseling 10 percent, as it would any other malefactor, set out to police all industry and all agriculture. The license became as important as a birth certificate. Restriction of cotton growing was made compulsory by the Bankhead Act, while the President was authorized to "impose" codes on recalcitrant industries, or to amend those already in effect.

Regimentation thus spread from those few basic economic activities that had been most affected by the depression to include more and more groups. From wheat and cotton, as originally proposed, agricultural control was extended to include 11 other crops which, sympathetically, were involved in competition.

Having established the principle of public subsidy, not for the creation of wealth, but for refraining from normal activity, more and more of our national economy has become dependent upon these artificial restoratives. Thus financial corrections are delayed; and the ultimate withdrawal of Government aid must inevitably produce another crisis no less serious than that which brought the present methods into being.

The chief criticism of the administration's course is that instead of eradicating those factors which have produced a disequilibrium between production and consumption, and between agricultural and industrial price levels, the present system tends to set up new evils more vicious and more lasting than those brought about by the depression. Let me illustrate this by citing the South's great cotton industry.

The cotton grower may not feel immediately concerned over the loss of foreign export markets so long as the Government purchases or lends on his output at 12 cents a pound. He may not now worry because Brazil and India and other countries are supplying cotton formerly purchased in America, or that exports have dropped in consequence to the lowest level in many years, or that Government holdings now exceed 6,000,000 bales. These facts are of the deepest significance; and is it not at once obvious that such a system cannot continue indefinitely?

Sooner or later, that part of our cotton production intended for foreign consumption must be permanently abandoned, or some new method found which will equalize the difference between European and American prices. Yet the administration at Washington has not discovered even the beginning of a solution for this important problem. Should the devices of expediency, brought about by the necessities of politics, be confirmed, by amending the Constitution, into a permanent national policy?

Similarly, when the grave problem of unemployment is examined, do we find effective headway being made in its solution? If so, why is the number of persons now on relief greater than a year ago? Congress has recently appropriated an additional $4,800,000,000 for a fresh attack on this most basic of all the depression factors. For weeks the Senate vainly sought information on how this vast sum was to be expended, as to the plans matured through which the administration promised that before fall 1935, 3,500,000 men were to be put back to work.

It now develops that there are virtually no plans, and that temporary expedients, like the ill-fated Civil Works Administration of last year, must now be resorted to, but which still equally fail to meet the test of permanent remedies. The expenditure of nearly two billions on the C. W. A. is admitted to have been a failure. With our public debt now approaching $30,000,000,000, how many more such failures can we afford? When the present $4,800,000,000 is exhausted, which will be by next July, are we to be confronted again with the same crisis and the necessity for still further billions? If this is all that planned economy can show, I leave it to you, is it not time to abandon such treacherous quicksands?

I raise these questions, not in captious criticism, but because they reach back to the heart of any proposed national regimentation of our economic life. A planned economy to succeed presupposes superior intelligence possessed by those who are its directors; it must not proceed on the basis of trial and error. A national administration which attacks bigness in business must itself be free from the evils it condemns.

The American political system rightly has been devised to preclude such supermen. Dictatorships were as common when the Constitution was adopted as they are today. They thrive only in periods of grave economic discontent. Instead the American plan as adopted by the founding fathers and which has successfully surmounted many major depressions, has limited such experiments to the States. Wisconsin or Louisiana, for example, can conduct whatever laboratories they please. The Nation can look on and check the results; it does not have to pay for their mistakes.

It is worth noting that Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell, Under-Secretary for Agriculture, and one of the guiding spirits of the new-deal philosophy, himself recognizes the fundamental issue which a constitutional amendment places before the people. Candidly he admits:

"It is a logical impossibility to have a planned economy and to have business operating its industries, just as it is also impossible to have one within our present constitutional and statutory structure. Modifications in both, so serious as to require destruction and rebeginning, are required."

"Destruction and rebeginning!" Is it any wonder that, faced with such a threat, a sense of impending disaster pervades the country?

As against these attempts to enforce recovery by Government control, let me cite for comparison the steps by which the great depression of 1920 was overcome. It too was world-wide, with its greatest intensity felt in the United States. The basic causes of that early post-war deflation and the present crisis are alike in many particulars, while the methods of treatment differ materially.

A great conference of industry was called at Washington to devise its own program of action. A plan of cooperation was then laid out, in which the Government was to assist, but for which business assumed the responsibility of execution. That is the first important difference in method. Next through capital expenditures made in the channels of normal business activity, and through concerted effort directed at the weak points in the business fabric, the force of the deflation was turned. Recovery in America preceded that of Europe and turned into an almost immediate prosperity. When we look for the reason, we find that cooperation, rather than a gun held at the head of business, provides the answer.

In the present emergency the results have been reversed. With the assumption of all initiative by the Government, America stands twenty-sixth among the nations in percentage of business revival. The advice of industrial and financial leaders is studiously ignored. The recommendations of the Business Advisory Council, formed by Secretary Roper of the Department of Commerce, for the specific purpose of guiding Government officials, are similarly ignored.

The wonder is, with this confusion in our national objectives, that recovery takes place at all. Instead of correcting deep-seated maladjustments, which require something more drastic than surface palliatives, we have embraced political necromancy that promised to restore prosperity painlessly. For should all other remedies fail, our faith remains unshaken in what economists call the "natural forces of recovery."

Contrast Great Britain's record during the past 3 years with the results that have been achieved in the United States. Let me quote from Premier Stanley Baldwin's recent statement:

"I cannot in this short talk enumerate all the good results which have accrued from the National Government's work, but I will draw your attention to a few of the more striking facts.

"Thanks to the readiness with which the country responded to the sacrifices demanded of it in 1931 and the care with which the national finances have been managed ever since, we now stand in a position which is unique among the great nations of the world. While other countries are still facing large budget deficits and some are even contemplating still heavier cuts, even in war pensions, we alone have enjoyed substantial Budget surpluses for 3 years past.

"We have, therefore, been able not only to restore the 1931 cuts but even to reduce taxation by sixty millions; but the return of sound financial conditions has done more than this. It has created that spirit of confidence without which the trade revival which we are now enjoying could never have occurred.

"It is a remarkable fact that when world trade as a whole shows little, if any, improvement since 1931, our country last year surpassed all previous records in the production of manufactured goods, and as a result the number of people in employment today is the highest ever recorded in the history of our country."

There the national budget is balanced, taxes are reduced, exports and imports are rising, factories are busy. Already recovery is an accomplished fact. Here no pretense of balancing the Budget is even made; the bill confronting the taxpayer is appalling, notwithstanding that in the last 3 years our national debt has practically doubled. American foreign trade has shriveled to the vanishing point, and our idle merchant marine is tied up to empty wharves. Forty percent of the population is dependent, in one way or another, upon Government aid. Thus far have we come, not in banishing want, but in sharing poverty.

British progress has been brought about by the curtailment of unproductive Government expenditures and a return to those old-fashioned virtues of thrift and saving. If I do not mistake the temper of the American people, they, too, are tired of this foolish squandering of public funds, of these attempts to lift ourselves by our bootstraps, of this mountain of Government debt which not only absorbs virtually half the savings intrusted to the country's banks but mortgages the future of our children and our children's children.

I spoke a moment ago of the philosophy which lies behind these new-deal activities and which contemptuously spurns the advice of business as well as the accumulated economic experience of generations. Let me recall again Professor Tugwell's phrase, "Destruction and rebeginning."

One can search in vain through the Democratic platform of 1932 for any reference to the program which is now being fitted like a strait-jacket to the American public. It stems further back, to the conference for progressive political action held in Cleveland in December 1924. Strangely, when we examine the leading participants in that campaign, we recognize many faces that have become familiar in the present administration at Washington. Here we meet Professor Tugwell, Mr. Donald Richberg, Mr. A. A. Berle, Jr., Mr. Basil Manly, and Dr. Frederic C. Howe. What were the things this little group of enlightened thinkers stood for in 1924? Let me quote the topics of the principal resolutions adopted:

"Public ownership of * * * water power and creation of a public superpower system."

"Strict public control and permanent conservation of all natural resources * * *."

"Promotion of public works in times of business depression."

"Reconstruction of the Federal Reserve and Federal Farm Loan Systems to provide for direct public control of the Nation's money and credit * * *."

"We favor submitting * * * a constitutional amendment providing that Congress may, by enacting a statute, make it effective over a judicial veto."

Are not these the very items emphasized on the administration's "must" legislative program? Has not this little "group of determined men", to paraphrase President Wilson, captured and suborned the great Democratic Party—that party which stood for generations at the very opposite pole of any such creed?

This method of acquiring control by "boring from within" is now accepted political technique among Socialists all over the world. It is thoroughly understood in Europe, but it is alien to America.

Here we have insisted that political issues be fought in the open, that they be submitted to the people for free discussion and referendum. We have really believed in the principles of such democratic institutions.

Certainly the public has the right to know what the new deal actually represents. The time has come to strip away all legal subterfuges so that we see the real purposes that lie behind.

"Destruction and rebeginning"—if that is the issue, the American people have both the courage and the honesty to meet it squarely without flinching. For one, I am confident of the verdict.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION ACTIVITIES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have a letter dated June 20 from Mr. Stewart McDonald, Acting Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration, giving by months the figures as to expenditures for modernization and repairs and insured loans, and also mortgages submitted with fees paid for survey and appraisal. These figures are so interesting that I ask that the letter and the statistics may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and statistics were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 20, 1935.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: The attached figures may interest you.

The activities under title I, which covers modernization and repairs, were commenced last fall and continued throughout the winter. With the opening of spring the program has gained momentum.

A very large amount of work, stimulated by nearly 8,000 F. H. A. civic campaigns, is done either for cash or uninsured loans. It is estimated that to date a total of $514,472,970 value of jobs have either been completed or are under way.

It was about April 1 before the various States had passed sufficient enabling laws to allow title II to function properly. Title II deals with the insurance of home mortgages.

During the past 11 weeks the weekly average of title I has been doubled and that of title II tripled.

The Federal Housing Administration itself does not make loans. Those reported are made by private capital either for modernization and repairs, new-dwelling construction, or refunding of existing mortgages.

Yours sincerely,

STEWART MCDONALD,
Acting Administrator.

JUNE 18, 1935.

Memorandum showing weekly volume from Apr. 1 to date

For week beginning—	Title I. Modernization and repair; insured loans	Title II. Mortgages submitted with fees paid for survey and appraisal
Apr. 1	$2,026,512	$2,483,000
Apr. 8	2,488,528	2,875,500
Apr. 15	2,551,199	3,364,800
Apr. 22	2,968,885	4,130,600
Apr. 29	2,780,865	6,975,200
May 6	3,247,010	5,984,500
May 13	3,476,317	5,907,200
May 20	3,496,452	8,139,800
May 27	3,609,707	5,204,600
June 3	3,187,933	7,085,000
June 10	4,275,784	7,391,400

Thirty-three percent of title II is new construction.

STEWART MCDONALD.

BULLETINS OF SEVENTY-SIX LEAGUE

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to print in the RECORD three bulletins from the Seventy-six League. The information contained in these is vital to the Nation, and I believe every American with the spirit of '76 in his breast should be given the information therein contained.

There being no objection, the bulletins were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Minute Man, May 1, 1935, Philadelphia, Pa.]

On January 24 of this year the President recommended to Congress the spending of $100,000,000 over a period of 20 years on what he called "the orderly development of national resources", together with the establishment of a permanent National Resources Board. The President especially referred to "what men and women are doing with their occupations, and to their mistakes in herding themselves together. Does this not sound like Russia's 5-year plan, where each man and woman must work and live according to the edict of the dictator?

The recent election of Mrs. William A. Becker, of Summit, N. J., as president of the Daughters of the American Revolution, is well worthy of comment. This is a direct rebuke to the radical element that has been striving for control of this national patriotic group.

In Mr. Herbert Hoover's recent message to the California Republican Assembly he voiced the opinion of all loyal American citizens. It was a fighting message. It opposed the newly created plan of regimentation and bureaucratic domination with a perfected system of orderly individual liberty under constitutionally conducted Government. It repudiated the economy of scarcity conception and appeals for economy based upon plentitude. Space does not permit a reprint of this notable message of Mr. Hoover's which clearly defines the issues. His argument merits the thoughtful attention of all minute men and women.

The Supreme Court should be removed from domination of the White House and Congress. The recent threat of Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma, who declared "If decisions of the Court are unfavorable to the administration, a motion for reargument would be made and before it could be heard new judges would be appointed to the Court, thus assuring a decision favorable to the administration. Many rights and guarantees which we thought were secured to us by the Constitution are being violated today. This is done on the theory that restrictions of the Constitution should be disregarded in emergencies. The acceptance of this doctrine would amount to abolition of the Constitution. It is in time of storm that the protection of the Constitution is most needed.

The Supreme Court is not really independent of Congress and the President. Through some strange oversight at the time the Constitution was adopted, the number of judges of this Court was not fixed and their appellate jurisdiction was not definitely set down. The number of judges can be increased by Congress and partisans of the administration can be appointed. On the other hand, Congress can deprive the Court of much of its jurisdiction if it chooses to do so. It might even forbid the Court to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress. Minute men and women should be ever alert as guardians af our Constitution.

The United States of America holds the dubious honor of having more than one-half of the world's unemployed. A recent survey calculates the jobless of all countries as 22,200,000, of which this country of ours claims 11,390,000. This doesn't sound well for the N. R. A.

Some more of the President's planned economy goes into the proposed banking bill. It is all political and gives the President's hand-picked board of governors the right to accept or reject an application for any loan they see fit. This absolutely places the control of the finances and credit of the Nation in the hands of the administration and would sew up any industry or business that was not in favor. Banks would function as depositories only.

The principles of destruction used by the Government of Soviet Russia are being copied by the A. A. A. In Russia the farmer has no property rights, where some 5,000,000 of these farmers were deprived of their products at the point of bayonet and without compensation, starved to death last year. In the United States our Government so far has not used the bayonet, but harvest campaigns have been put on in selected groups through taxation, regulation, supervision, and political management quite as effective. The sound of the Government sickle as it mows down industry can be heard throughout the length and breadth of the land. The joys of the reapers and the tears of the sowers are mingled together in the harvest campaign which is now in full swing in this glorious country of ours.

[The Minute Man, Apr. 1, 1935, Philadelphia, Pa.]

Receipts and disbursements of the Federal Government for the year 1935:

Total receipts (computed)	$3,123,000,000
Operation and maintenance of regular departments and establishments	1,235,000,000
Veterans pensions and benefits	610,000,000
Interest on national debt	835,000,000
Tax refunds	68,000,000
Total regular expenditures	2,748,000,000
Recovery and relief:
Agricultural Adjustment Administration:
Processing taxes	589,000,000
Expenditures	788,000,000
Other recovery and relief	4,472,000,000
Total recovery and relief	5,260,000,000
Debt retirements	573,000,000
Total expenditures	8,581,000,000
Total receipts	3,712,000,000
Gross deficit	4,869,000,000

The $4,000,000,000 set out in the work-relief bill does not appear in the above figures. The national debt is well over the $30,000,000,000 mark, and the administration is spending around $7 for every $3 it takes in.

Inflation always starts when expenditures exceed the income. A further devaluation of the dollar can be expected, with higher prices for commodities.

One hundred million people want to buy merchandise. Unemployment, low wages, high prices, and the shrinkage of the dollar make this impossible. Minimum wages and maximum hours will never set the small business man and manufacturer on his feet, which is so necessary to a permanent recovery. The N. R. A. in any form is restrictive to business and destructive to our established form of government.

The new-deal administration is not anxious to have the Supreme Court make a ruling on the constitutionality of the N. R. A.

The work-relief bill, with its $4,880,000,000 appropriation, the spending of which is entirely turned over to the discretion of the President, has passed both the Senate and House in a form suitable to the White House. Its final enactment will only be a matter of a few days. The bill contains many drastic and un-American provisions. It grants the President the right of eminent domain, which is the right to confiscate property, both personal and real. It grants him the power to imprison for 2 years and to fine $5,000 any person who would in any way obstruct any of his so-called "plans for recovery." This could mean the elimination of free speech and a free press. Such things are destructive to the rights and liberties of a free people.

The utility holding companies bill looks like a sure passage, with some modification. In any form it is destructive to invested capital.

The Federal Reserve System is to be reorganized in a bill now pending which will virtually create a central bank. This is dangerous to the credit of individuals and industry not in accord with the administration.

The "pink slip" repeal has passed both Houses and is now in conference committee, with final passage assured.

The House Military Affairs Committee has before it a bill to end the use of the National Guard in all labor disputes except where governors of States first obtain permission from the War Department. You should immediately protest this measure by writing your representatives in Congress.

The European situation is much more serious than what appears upon the surface. It is well that our Government keep out of any alliances at this time. It is good policy to prepare to prevent any invasion, both from without and within.

[Seventy-six League, Philadelphia, Pa.]

Every American citizen who believes in the Declaration of Independence, which gave birth to the Constitution of the United States of America, should become a member of the Seventy-six League, the minute men and women of today.

The league was organized October 15, 1934, by a small group of just plain ordinary citizens, who had a firm belief in Americanism, and has since enjoyed a steady and healthy growth.

The league is strictly nonpolitical and nonpartisan. Its real objective is to defend and uphold the Constitution and the freedom of our country, to promote Americanism wherever necessary, and to carry on a national educational campaign toward the elimination of radicals.

Organizations with radical aims and purposes are springing up in all parts of these United States. Our political structure has become tainted through the workings of those who wish to destroy. Industry and business have set up groups that are harmful to the welfare of the people. All of which is un-American and not conforming to the standard and principle of American Government. There is no denying that there is a real peril at our door. Are we in a position to shut out this peril? The answer will be found in proper organization, for there still exists in America a majority of loyal citizens. The Seventy-six League invites these loyal citizens to become minute men and women every citizen, man or woman, in the shop, in the field, in the mill, in the office, in the business world, in the home, or any walk of life who wishes to continue the freedom guaranteed by our Constitution must awaken to their responsibilities. The burden cannot be borne by just a few, but all loyal citizens must enlist in this great American movement and do their part.

The league is governed by an executive committee chosen from the membership in the districts in which they reside. The executive committee will be divided into two separate divisions, namely, administrative and advisory. The administrative committee will be composed of not more than 12 active members. The advisory committee will be composed of not more than 48, selected from the membership in the various States having a membership of 100 or more. Through the advisory committee State, county, and local units will be formed, with each unit having representation on the State committee.

The league stands for just and sane legislation, so long as it does not conflict with the Constitution. It does not advocate, nor does it suggest, any wild and fantastical ideas and plans of government, believing that, if Government followed the Constitution, and that the rights of the people and business were not abridged that recovery would be swift and sure.

The league believes that certain evils of a business nature have taken root in our economic structure during the past years, and that these evils should be eliminated. However, such matters will naturally come to pass as time progresses, and providing that the league receives the support of the loyal citizens. Radicalism, crooked politicians, and business crooks must be wiped out. Fantastical legislation must be repealed and the just and sane laws rigidly enforced.

The menace to democracy lies to a greate extent in the subversive theories and destructive doctrines of native-born citizens high in the councils of American Government who have already planted the seed of communism and discontent in millions of our citizens for their own selfish purposes. It is the work of the Seventy-six League, through the minute men and women, to counteract this great harm and to bring back these millions into the fold of Americanism.

There are no fees, dues, or assesments to a membership in the Seventy-six League. The league depends upon the liberality of those who are able to make contributions.

Through the educational division of the league we sell a beautifully framed copy of the Declaration of Independence, size 14 by 17 inches, for the exceptionally low price of $3. This should be hanging upon the wall of every home, office, and factory. It is the emblem of freedom and liberty of America.

We also issue in pamphlet form a combination of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. This embodies a complete transcript of these two famous documents. Everyone should know the contents; it gives a better understanding as to why we are a Nation of laws and not of men. The price is only 50 cents.

Either one will be sent to any address within the United States by parcel post prepaid upon receipt of the price.

We mean to stand upon the Constitution, we need no other platform, we shall know but one country. No man can suffer too much, and no man can fall too soon if he suffer or if he fall in the defense of the liberties and constitution of his country. Become a minute man or woman today.

SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. AUSTIN obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	Keyes	Overton
Ashurst	Copeland	King	Pittman
Austin	Costigan	La Follette	Radcliffe
Bachman	Davis	Logan	Robinson
Bailey	Dickinson	Lonergan	Russell

Capper	Harrison	Neely	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Wagner
Chavez	Hatch	Norris	Walsh
Clark	Hayden	Nye	Wheeler
Connally	Johnson	O'Mahoney	White

Mr. ROBINSON. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] are unavoidably detained from the Senate, and that the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on important public business.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] in the nature of a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The resolution of Mr. HASTINGS in the nature of a substitute for the resolution submitted by Mr. GEORGE (S. Res. 155) is as follows:

Resolved, That the election of Rush D. Holt to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having attained the age of 30 years at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks in support of the views of the minority and in support of the resolution in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. At the outset I express the opinion that there is not a member of the committee which considered the evidence who is not interested in the young people of the United States and who has not an earnest desire to have them take an interest in public affairs and to assume just as much of the responsibility and burden of government as they are able to bear.

More specifically, let me say that in this case Mr. Holt, who appeared before the committee, made an excellent impression, and that he presented his case with ability, frankness, and candor. I will not occupy the time of the Senate longer in this connection than to read a brief extract from his testimony, proving beyond question the honesty and the frankness of Mr. Holt both before the committee and before the people of the State of West Virginia in his campaign. I do not offer this merely as a compliment; I offer it because I consider it of probative force on the question pending before the Senate. I now read from page 20 of the hearings:

Senator KING. Let me ask you a question.

Mr. HOLT. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. Since the matter of your age was the subject of controversy, did you in any of your addresses state that you were only 29 years of age, but you believed that under the Clay case and the Shields case, in view of the precedents established in those cases, you would be eligible? Was that the position you took?

Mr. HOLT. The position I took was this: That I was 29; and according to the precedents in four cases I was eligible, because they were all four definitely in my favor and none against me. Particularly in the Clay and Mason cases, they were both seated under the age of 30.

All through my speeches, I want to tell the committee, without a single exception, in every speech I made in West Virginia, in every county with the exception of two, I told every audience, without exception, that I was 29, and that Henry Clay was seated under that age.

Senator KING. You rather capitalized upon your age?

Mr. HOLT. I admit I was glad to raise the question.

Mr. President, that is important in the matter before us because it clears from this case any element of personal bias or prejudice; it clears from this case any element of fraud in the election; it makes plain to the Senate exactly what the candidate meant and what the voters of West Virginia meant when they voted in support of the candidate upon that representation. It is also important because of the law. If the voters realized that the election of a candidate only 29 years of age would create a vacancy in the United States Senate and, for any period of time, however short, would change the composition of the United States Senate, then the problem before the Senate today would be whether the election was valid or void. If they had willfully, with full knowledge, undertaken to flaunt the Constitution of the United States with respect to the composition of the Senate and, with respect to the prohibition in the Constitution, "Thou shalt not", then under the law we, as a Senate, would be bound to hold that the votes so cast were void for fraud.

For the sake of the record I refer to the case of People ex rel. Furman v. Clute (50 New York 451), which, I think, expresses this principle quite well:

We think that the rule is this: The existence of the fact which disqualifies, and of the law which makes that fact operate to disqualify, must be brought home so closely and so clearly to the knowledge or notice of the elector, as that to give his vote therewith indicates an intent to waste it. The knowledge must be such, or the notice so brought home, as to imply a willfulness in acting, when action is in opposition to the natural impulse to save the vote and make it effectual. He must act so in defiance of both the law and the fact, and so in opposition to his own better knowledge, that he has no right to complain of the loss of his franchise, the exercise of which he has wantonly misapplied.

That refers to the votes. I need comment no further upon that point. The atmosphere is clear of extraneous issues, and we come right down to the close question of whether there is a date under the Constitution when a Senator's term of office begins, a date fixed by unchangeable law, fixed by the Constitution of a great country, and made unchangeable by being expressly excluded from the usual right of amendment granted in article V of that Constitution.

Considering that question, what do we find? The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Senate of January 3, 1935, at page

4, where the credentials of Senators-elect were laid before the Senate by the Vice President, and ordered to be placed on file and to be printed in the RECORD, shows the following:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 6th day of November 1934 RUSH DEW HOLT was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of West Virginia a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of 6 years beginning on the 3d day of January 1935.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor, H. G. Kump, and our seal, hereto affixed, at Charleston, this 3d day of December, A. D. 1934.

H. G. KUMP, Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL]

WM. G. O'BRIEN,
Secretary of State.

Mr. President, there was nothing in that certificate which was not strictly according to the facts. There was nothing in that certificate which was not strictly in accordance with the votes of the electorate of West Virginia. The voters of West Virginia acted upon the representation made in every speech, and in every county save two in West Virginia, that the person named in that certificate would be seated in the United States Senate on the 3d day of January 1935. That is the effect of the representation that "I told every audience without exception that I was 29 and that Henry Clay was seated under that age."

In other words, West Virginia as a State never assented to the proposition that a person elected Senator from West Virginia should have the power to postpone the beginning of his term. West Virginia acted on the belief, and it must be thought here that the candidate also believed it, that because of the precedents this certificate of the title to the office would enable their Senator-elect to be sworn in and to take his seat on January 3, 1935.

In passing, it ought to be stated that this cannot be regarded as a waiver by West Virginia of the last clause of article V of the Constitution, which provides that the Constitution may be amended in all particulars save one—"that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

No one can justly argue that the election in West Virginia on that representation was such a consent as article V requires. In the first place, article V relates to an amendment of the Constitution. It does not relate to an evasion of the Constitution; and this vote, if it were to be interpreted as consent, is consent to nothing more than an evasion of the terms of the Constitution. So we, as a minority, claim that upon no view of the problem does the vote of West Virginia amount to a consent that West Virginia should be deprived of her representation in the United States Senate for 1 day, but, on the contrary, it proves that West Virginia consented alone that she should be represented by a young man, a man of 29, believing that because he would become 30 during the term he was entitled, under the precedents, to take his oath and seat at the beginning of the term.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. HATCH. Does the Senator consider it important whether or not the people of West Virginia did so consent?

Mr. AUSTIN. In this regard, Mr. President, is it important: In the record appears the following claim by Mr. HOLT, found on page 19 of the record:

> Can anyone doubt but that the State of West Virginia did give such consent in the general election held last November by the very powerful and sovereign expression of the State, the will of the people?

It answers that question raised by Mr. HOLT.

Mr. HATCH. Of course, I consider it important always to know the will of the people, and that the will of the people should prevail if it is possible for that to be done; but I was thinking, as the Senator was speaking, of the remark concerning the question in one of the debates—I think in the Shields debate, by Senator Webster—when he said that if the people of the State did consent it would make no difference to him; even if every citizen of the State appeared in person before the Senate, they could not waive the Constitution.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for that reminder. I believe the Senator is correct. I believe Daniel Webster was correct in that statement; and, for one, I am ready to stand upon the principle that no State may change the composition of the Senate by its consent alone; that the Senate may not change the composition of the Senate by agreement with a State; and certainly and finally, as I see it, so far as this case is concerned, no individual may change the composition of the Senate by act or word.

Now where do we find ourselves? The certificate of election having been filed on January 3, certain memorials were presented to the Senate. The memorials recited the facts which are well known to the Senate, and then demanded judgment of the only tribunal which has authority to pass judgment upon the state of facts set forth, the United States Senate. The memorialists asked the United States Senate to declare a vacancy existing in the office of a Senator from West Virginia; all this before Mr. HOLT arrived at the age of 30 years. I ask Senators, can any lapse of time, can any act of Members of the Senate or of the Senate as a body, alter the situation when judgment was demanded of the Senate? If they cannot do so, then we are right in the contention that before Mr. HOLT became of the age of 30 years, at a time when apparently everybody who has discussed this matter pro and con admits he was ineligible to a seat in the Senate, the issue was formed, and the Senate in this case, as it did in the Shields case, and as it did in the Gallatin case, had the solemn duty to perform of passing upon that issue with respect to what the Constitution required; not with respect to what might be expedient or good policy, and entirely unaffected by any extraneous emotion or desire to add to this body a fine young man who would be able to contribute a great service to his country.

The minority view this problem purely on the scientific basis of what is necessary to preserve the Government of the United States, for we are dealing here not merely with the question of one man's position in that Government, but we are dealing here with a fundamental, a great branch of the Government, the legislative branch, which, under the Constitution, must consist of a House of Representatives and of a Senate the composition of which is prescribed, and the composition of which cannot be changed for a day save by certain solemn acts.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Do I understand correctly the Senator from Vermont to say that the composition of the body of the Senate cannot be changed even with the consent of the State affected?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont did not mean to say that. This is what I intended: The composition of the Senate stands in a position different from that of any other feature of the frame of Government as laid down in the Constitution. I need not go into the history of it; it is too well known how jealous the States were regarding their representation in the Congress. It is also well known how important it seemed to them that this Union of theirs should be an indissoluble Union, and that this Government should be indestructible so far as any act within the Constitution is concerned, and that to destroy it or to take from its frame in any way it was necessary to have certain formal acts prescribed in article V of the Constitution. Article V provides a way to change this Government, but it says that when it is undertaken to change the composition of the United States Senate something more must be done than is done with respect to any other part of the Government. There must be at some time—and my notion is that it must precede the action of Congress—assent expressed by the State or States whose suffrage in the Senate is to be changed.

I cannot conceive of that expression meaning something less than a formal expression by the State of equal solemnity to that which is required for any other amendment of the Constitution. Therefore, I believe that such assent or consent of the State must be by and through its legislature, or by and through a convention called to make the expression thereof.

That is one step. The next step, of course, is the usual one for amending the Constitution—a two-thirds vote of both Houses of the Congress recommending it, and an adoption of it by three-fourths of the several States in order to ratify and make the change. That being done, the composition of the Senate can be changed.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Does not the Senator think that a State which, with full knowledge of all the facts, acts or fails to act in a fashion which would change its representation in the Senate, may thereby consent to a change in its representation in this body?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not without an amendment of the Constitution. That is my position.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am inclined to agree with the Senator's proposition that a State's legal right to representation in the Senate cannot be changed without very formal action; but, of course, the Senator is familiar with the fact that, as a matter of practice, there have been many vacancies in the Senate, some of them existing for a long time. Is it possible that the Senator contends that a State may not permit a vacancy to exist, or that an individual having been elected to represent a State may not defer entering upon his duties here?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not make that claim.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then will the Senator develop that position and reconcile it with the well-known fact, for example, that as late as January 1932 we swore in the Senator from Louisiana, whose term had begun on March 4, 1931, and who voluntarily refused to come here until January 1932, and yet no objection was made?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the fact that there have been many cases where the Constitution was not conformed to does not set a precedent to be followed in a case where the issue is raised as it is here. That does not count, it seems to me, as any precedent at all, save in this respect, that if we were about to change the Constitution, and there had been followed in our Government a policy or there had grown up a practice outside of the Constitution which seemed to be a good one, then it would be worthy of consideration; but, as I view it, our duty here is not one based upon policy; our duty is to pass upon the legal question; and that is all we are considering.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, the point I am making is that it is well-established practice that a person having been elected to the Senate may for any reason of his own defer the time at which he takes his office, and no objection has ever been made. That an objection might not be made if he should unreasonably delay I do not say, but I do say that persons elected have delayed for over a year with no objection ever having been raised, and the precedent is well established.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, admitting that to be true, it does not affect the question before us, because in this case we have this vital difference—that memorialists of West Virginia have raised the question, and therefore it is put up to us to pass upon it, and we must do it; we cannot evade it.

I do not at all criticize anyone for holding views in opposition to mine about this matter, and I want it to be understood that my remarks have no edge to them whatever of that character. I am really interested in nothing more than having the record show clearly our position as the minority on the legal question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have been following the Senator's argument, but it does not seem in this respect to be sound, if I may make that observation, in that we have no obligation under the Constitution unless someone files a memorial here. In other words, if no memorial had been filed, the Senator says, by inference, that Mr. HOLT would now be a full-fledged Senator from West Virginia, notwithstanding the fact that he is arguing that the election was void from the time it took place. Certainly those two observations can not be reconciled.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; they cannot, and I do not think that inference can be drawn from my position. I have never admitted that because there were precedents where men came in after the beginning of their terms, and did not come until then, they were therefore Senators in the meantime. I have never admitted that.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will, I think, concede, if I may interrupt him further, that if the memorialists from West Virginia had not filed the objections, according to his argument, in the probable course of events Mr. HOLT would now be a Senator. If there had been no objections filed Mr. HOLT would now be a Senator. Is that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us see.

Mr. TYDINGS. If that be correct, then we would seat a man who the Senator contends never was elected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I hardly consent to that. The many instances which I understand the Senator from Ohio to cite were not instances where there was a disqualification under the Constitution.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I follow the Senator's argument. I do not say that I agree with it, but I can see its consistency, up to the point where the Senator says we get into this controversy because a memorial was filed by certain citizens of West Virginia, and therefore, as they have raised the point, we must now pass on it irrespective of what took place in other cases where memorialists did not make their appearance. By inference the Senator says that if people in West Virginia had not filed this memorial or protest, the Senator from West Virginia would in all likelihood have been sworn in yesterday, and would now be a full-fledged Senator. Yet we are debating the question here that in the election held on the 6th of last November, according to the Senator's point of view, for which I can see there is much sound ground, Mr. HOLT was not in fact elected because he was ineligible then, and cannot take his seat. But if these memorialists had not come in, according to the inference to be drawn from the Senator's argument, as I take it, Mr. HOLT already would have been a Senator today, notwithstanding the fact that his election was void.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me first answer the question. As I understand my own position, it is that no precedent can be set up to guide our thought in this matter by mere inaction. That is my point. Here we have action. Here we have an issue raised by the filing of the credentials—at the beginning of the term according to the twentieth amendment—and the protest of the memorialists, thereupon the taking of the testimony, thereupon the filing of these reports, and we are now debating a matter as of the issue raised, are we not? I cannot conceive of having a case made new every day by the lapse of time or by events, self-serving or otherwise, which occur subsequent thereto.

Now I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland suggested that he draws a certain inference from the argument presented by the Senator from Vermont, and then, having drawn that inference, he points out an apparent inconsistency in the Senator's position.

I also was endeavoring to follow the Senator from Vermont, and I draw a contrary inference, and because the inference which I draw is different from that drawn by the Senator from Maryland I do not regard the argument as inconsistent.

It seems to me that the question which the Senator is discussing and the presentation which he has made in behalf of it are leading very close to the real question involved in this case. I think no Senator will claim that the Constitution unequivocally defines the time at which the age qualification must exist. In the absence of an unequivocal and specific definition in the Constitution, of course, construction is necessary.

It would seem to me that the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont leads us directly to the question whether that construction should be based upon political expediency or parliamentary strategy or whether it should be based upon the meaning and purpose of the Constitution itself. To me it is utterly inconceivable that the framers of the Constitution intended that a Senator-elect should be permitted to determine whether or not there was a vacancy, and should be permitted to determine whether or not his election was void, all by the wisdom or sagacity with which he proceeded; that is to say, that one lacking the age qualification could determine that his election was not void and that his seat was not vacant merely by waiting for time to answer the requirements as to age.

Certainly this question ought not to be determined by the sagacity of the man elected; it ought to be determined by the construction which the Senate is bound to place upon the Constitution of the United States, and if that construction is as indicated by the Senator from Vermont, of course the qualification of the Senator-elect to be a Senator cannot depend on whether he is wise enough to remain quiet and in retirement until after age qualification has been attained by lapse of time. I am impressed that it is better in every way that there be a construction of paragraph 3, section 3, of article I that fixes the beginning of the term as the time when the age qualification must be established and that the paragraph is susceptible of this construction. Otherwise there is no definite and binding rule, and no voter will ever know whether a youthful candidate is qualified for service in this body. The seating of Mr. HOLT suggests no public advantage sufficient to compensate for this condition of uncertainty. I favor the substitute resolution denying Mr. HOLT his seat, upon the ground that at the beginning of his term he lacked the constitutional age qualification and therefore could not assume his seat. A vacancy results and should be declared by the Senate. The election was void, not because the age qualification applies on election day, but because Mr. HOLT could not qualify at the time contemplated by the Constitution. This view is consistent with the precedents cited. I thank the Senator from Vermont for permitting this interruption.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Oregon has just so ably expressed; and if I shall not become diverted from my line of thought, I will come to the precise question which he points as looming up before us.

Mr. STEIWER. Permit me to say to the Senator that neither the Senator from Maryland nor the Senator from Oregon was endeavoring to divert the Senator from Vermont from his line of thought.

Mr. AUSTIN. I understand that. On the question of the passage of time having anything to do with this matter, we do not have to follow our own imperfect reasoning. We have interpretation of this particular clause of the Constitution to guide us. We have the Senates of years ago telling us about it, and how they viewed it. That is the value of the Shields case. It makes very little difference to me, in dealing with this question, whether we call it a precedent or not; it makes very little difference to me whether the Senate went beyond the issue, beyond what was necessary to be decided in adopting the resolution which they adopted, and the several resolutions preceding the final one; the important thing to my mind is that after full and thorough debate the Senate of that time enunciated the principle that lapse of time cannot change the constitutional requirement. That was the meat of the Shields case.

There was offered in the Senate a resolution to postpone action until sufficient time had elapsed, and then to have the Senate consider the matter after the defect of time in the title had been cured, and the Senate voted not to allow that continuance or postponement to take place on the grounds stated in the debate; that it could not change the facts; that the facts were unchangeable. The disqualification having existed at the beginning of the term of General Shields, nothing which could be done afterward could change or remedy that disqualification; so they refused to allow the postponement of consideration of the case then pending; they refused to allow General Shields to resign. That whole matter has been argued, and I will not reargue it.

In this connection let me call attention to how closely they considered the principles of that case to apply to a case such as the present one. I read Mr. Underwood's remarks from page 9 of the Reply of Memorialists to brief and argument of the respondent.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts held in a certain case that the people could not vote for a dead man. The man who received the largest number of votes was dead on election day. I inquire from the Senator whether it is his opinion that the people can vote for a man who, under the Constitution, is ineligible.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I answer the Senator that they can. I do not wish to answer without qualification.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should think not.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to finish the answer. They can; but whether their vote shall count or not depends upon whether they did it willfully, knowingly, and in defiance of the law and the facts. Of course, in the case of a dead man, there is the practical difficulty that when they vote for a man and afterward discover that he is a dead man, it is an ineffectual thing. If there is no fraud connected with it, that is another matter. I realize that there are cases to the contrary. However, I wish to say that I do not consider that the person who received a minority of votes in such an election was elected. I cannot see it that way. In order to have such person elected the votes cast for the dead man would have to have been fraudulent votes, and the election declared fraudulent. In such case I think there woud have to be a new election. That is my view of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am moved to ask this question because the Senator has referred to electing a dead man. I think such a case has actually occurred. I have not thought of it in connection with this discussion, but I believe several years ago that actually occurred in the State of Wisconsin, where for some State office—I do not now remember what it was, not having thought of it for years—a dead man was actually elected, those voting for him knowing he was dead when they elected him. He died at a time when it was too late to place the name of anyone else on the ballot. The people elected him, and then, of course, there was a vacancy, because there was no one to take the office. However, no one claimed, as I understand, that the man receiving the next greatest number of votes was elected, or that the votes cast for the dead man should not be counted.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that is my view. I think there must be fraud in order to have such votes cast out as ineffectual, in which event, if all of them were disregarded and rejected, certainly the other man would have the majority of votes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I ask this question to see if I correctly understand the rule about which the discussion is proceeding at this time. I have understood that in a case where the voters cast their votes for a person who is ineligible—without going into any fine distinctions as to what constitutes ineligibility, let us say he is ineligible—if they do so knowing his ineligibility, the English rule is that the opponent is elected. The American rule is that under such circumstances the opponent is not elected. However, those ineligible votes do not amount to anything. There is simply no election; and no one is elected in the case where the voters know the candidate is ineligible. Is that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not know whether it is correct or not, but I agree with the statement of the Senator. The holding which is my authority largely for that position is one which I am about to read. I have great reliance on this particular expression, coming from People against Clute, to which I previously referred:

He must act—

Meaning the voter—

He must act so in defiance of both the law and the fact, and so in opposition to his own better knowledge, that he has no right to complain of the loss of his franchise, the exercise of which he has wantonly misapplied.

Mr. HATCH. Does that case hold that under such circumstances the opponent is elected? Is that an American case?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; this case held the other way. It is an American case.

Mr. HATCH. That is the American rule. Under it the opponent in such event is not considered elected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I believe that to be so.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Merely in the interest of accuracy, I wish to observe that even under the American rule the votes cast for the ineligible candidate do mean something. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], as I understood him, asserted that they meant nothing. In one sense that is true, but I think, under the very great weight of authority, they are given effect to the extent that they spell the defeat of the opposition candidate, and I think the Senator from New Mexico did not speak accurately the thought which was in his mind.

Mr. HATCH. Yes; Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon is correct in that respect, I am sure.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, speaking of the Shields case, in whatever light it is taken, we of the minority give consideration to the debate as bearing upon the reasoning which should be applied to the instant case, and in that debate I think we see a reference directly to our present situation. This is from Mr. Underwood, page 9 of the Reply of Memorialists.

Now let us reason about this matter: Let us look at the Constitution. The Constitution says that unless an individual has been 9 years a citizen of the United States he cannot be a Senator of the United States. And that is not the only prohibition.

Evidently the author here omitted something from the quotation, but I continue the quotation:

Suppose then, you elect a man who is under 30 years of age, is not the election void?

They debated that question, and, as Senators all know, they decided that that was not necessarily so; that the time to which the prohibition should be applied is not the date of the election, but the date of the beginning of his term.

I care not whether that is called a precedent; it makes no difference what it is called; it was the action of the United States Senate upon a similar state of facts, and it is the reasoning of these men which I think is of help to us in our own reasoning here.

The question has been raised here whether the Shields case followed or diverged from the Gallatin case, and the claim has been made that the Gallatin case and the Shields case differ in principle. I cannot see that. As I read those two cases they stand upon the same principle which we of the minority assert in this case. In both the Gallatin case and the Shields case the candidate was not a citizen of 9 years' standing at either the date of the election or the date of the beginning of his term. In that respect they were identical.

The resolution in the Gallatin case did not specify whether the disqualification was at the beginning of the term or at the date of election. Let me call attention to the wording of the Gallatin resolution:

Resolved, That the election of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States.

That is all there is to that resolution. Therefore it cannot be said that it was decided that he was not a Senator because at the date of his election the time required to qualify him as a citizen had not elapsed. The resolution can be taken to apply either way, because either way the same principle applies.

However, how did the Senate look upon it in the Shields case? The Gallatin case must have meant a great deal to the Senate, because there were on the senatorial committee such men as Oliver Ellsworth, who had been not only a member of the Constitutional Convention which wrote these articles but also a member of the convention which framed the Articles of Confederation. On that committee were men who probably possessed the most scientific knowledge of the principles of government of any men in the country, and they were currently acquainted with the very instrument which they were interpreting.

In 1849 the Senators who were passing on the Shields case looked back to the Gallatin case, as we look back to it now. I have heard it argued here by those who, I think, do not know these facts, that the Shields case did not follow the Gallatin case and that the Gallatin case was not a precedent for the Shields case. Now, let us look into the record briefly on that point. We find Senator Butler, in the debate on the Shields case, saying this:

I dissent, then, so far as I am concerned, from the report of the committee; and I do so by virtue of precedents in my own State and the case of Mr. Gallatin.

And that is only one straw upon the surface of the stream of history. Going back to the Congressional Globe and turning to the remarks of George Mason, the chairman of that special committee, we find in discussing the Shields case and the value given to the Gallatin case, his saying this on the Senate floor—I am reading from the Congressional Globe, page 334, date of March 13, 1849:

I believe I am correct in saying that the committee in the course of their deliberations took as their guide the case of Mr. Gallatin, as it is set out in the Journal of the Senate. The case of Mr. Gallatin substantially was this—

Then he proceeds to state what the case was.

So, Mr. President, whether or not you call them precedents or expressions of principle, when the Senate in the Shields case added the words "at the commencement of the term for which he was elected", the Senate did so holding the same view as was held by that great Senate of the early days as to the construction of our Constitution. Their views should be the voice of wisdom to us; the fact that they spoke with venerable accent gives more rather than less weight to them, and in passing upon this question we ought to consider ourselves blessed by having the opinions of such great men as these to guide us and help us in our own reasoning.

Now I read, concluding my argument in that respect, the resolution in the Shields case:

Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

So, Mr. President, if you wish to call that a precedent, that and the Shields case are the only precedents in the Senate upon the issue now before us; and if we are going to do what it seems apparent to me we are about to do, we ought to do it in the spirit of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], who comes right out and says, "I recognize the voice of former Congresses interpreting the Constitution in a certain way, but I am for reversing that interpretation." That places us right where we belong.

Thus we arrive at the conclusion—and with this observation I desire to close my remarks—that these cases fix the time when the constitutional provision and prohibition must be applied to be at the commencement of the term of a Senator-elect. The twentieth amendment fixes that date to be the 3d day of January, in this case, 1935. So it seems to me, Mr. President, that if we were to vote down the substitute offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and adopt the original resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], we would, in effect, be resolving—

That Rush D. Holt is entitled to his seat in the United States Senate as a Senator from the State of West Virginia, it appearing that he was 30 years of age at the time when he presented himself to the Senate to take the oath and to assume the duties of the office; and—

Now I am adding what follows—

and regardless of the fact that he was not eligible under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States to assume the duties of the office of United States Senator on the day that the term for which he was elected began, or to serve the full term for which he was elected.

If we can do that in conscience and according to our sense of duty and responsibility, it is not my intent to judge of any man for doing so; he does it on his view of the Constitution and his interpretation of it; but by making that addition to the resolution I mean to point out how absurd it appears to the minority to take that position in view of the utter inability of any man, of any State, or the Senate itself, to change the composition of the United States Senate and the absolute knowledge we have that the Senate, as is the Government of the United States, is indestructible by any act within the Constitution, and the only way to destroy it or to break it down is by going outside the Constitution.

Mr. President, for these reasons, as well as those expressed in the very able written views submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], in which I concur, and those set forth in the minority views signed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] and myself, I believe that the resolution offered by the Senator from Delaware as a substitute for the original resolution should be adopted.

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	Keyes	Overton
Ashurst	Copeland	King	Pittman
Austin	Costigan	La Follette	Radcliffe
Bachman	Davis	Logan	Robinson
Bailey	Dickinson	Lonergan	Russell
Bankhead	Dieterich	Long	Schall
Barkley	Donahey	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Bilbo	Duffy	McCarran	Sheppard
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Shipstead
Bone	Frazier	McKellar	Smith
Borah	George	McNary	Steiwer
Brown	Gerry	Maloney	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Gibson	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulow	Glass	Minton	Trammell
Burke	Gore	Moore	Truman
Byrd	Guffey	Murphy	Tydings
Byrnes	Hale	Murray	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Neely	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Wagner
Chavez	Hatch	Norris	Walsh
Clark	Hayden	Nye	Wheeler
Connally	Johnson	O'Mahoney	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I shall take but little of the time of the Senate to discuss the pending question. I had supposed originally the well-known Gallatin and Shields cases were applicable to this case and that they practically determined the matter. From my point of view, it was impossible to distinguish those cases from the case now before the Senate. As the hearings developed and as the committee considered the question, a decided difference of opinion became very evident.

It was interesting to me in that connection to review the address of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] delivered to the Senate in the early part of December 1931, at which time he submitted a resolution to the Senate concerning the appointment and seating of the present senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] to fill the vacancy created by the death of Senator Morrow. Under some provision of the statute of New Jersey it was necessary for a vacancy to exist before that appointment could be made. The Senator from Nevada submitted to the Senate at that time a resolution, the effect of which was to declare that a person elected, and who was qualified to take the office at the beginning of his term, became a Senator at the beginning of that term and did not have to wait until he took the oath of office.

An investigation of the facts in this case caused me to reach the conclusion that the adoption of that resolution at that time would have been conclusive in the present case, and I think it is admitted by those presenting the majority report in this case that if it had been determined that a person became a Senator at the beginning of his term, and not when he took the oath of office, that would determine this matter against Mr. Holt.

That particular resolution unfortunately was not acted upon by the Senate, but was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The subject of the resolution, the present senior Senator from New Jersey, was admitted as a Senator and took the oath of office, and during the time he filled out the unexpired term of Mr. Morrow the question involved in the resolution was not determined, and has not as yet been determined.

In the views of the minority, however, we have pointed out that the determination of this question determines the question involved in the Pittman resolution, and it determines it in what might be called the negative. That is, if we seat Mr. Holt and adopt the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], we definitely determine that a man does not become a United States Senator until he takes the oath of office.

I shall try to avoid repeating the argument which has been made here. There are some things in the report to which I desire to call attention, and there is one thing not in the minority report, which I discovered since its preparation, which I think in all fairness I should bring to the attention of the Senate. I do that particularly because I want to be fair to the Senate and because I want a record which is accurate as nearly as possible.

In the minority report we have laid particular stress upon the fact that the Senate construed the Constitution in this respect by enacting a law in 1883 to the effect that when a Senator presents his credentials to the Senate he is entitled to be placed upon the pay roll and thereafter to receive his pay. The argument contended for by the minority is that that was a construction of the Constitution, a construction and a determination of the question raised by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] in the resolution to which I have referred, namely, that it would be inconsistent and would be a wrong assumption that the Congress would enact a law placing a person on the pay roll as a Member of the Senate if it be a fact that he is not a Member of the Senate and does not become a Member of the Senate until he takes the oath of office.

The first act I knew anything about was passed in 1883. The terms of it are found in the minority report. We called attention to the fact that after the twentieth amendment to the Constitution became effective a new act was passed by the Congress in June 1934 in language a little different but to the same effect. It is based upon the fact that salaries of Senators begin and are paid from the beginning of their terms rather than from the time they take the oath of office.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Does it not in all fairness demonstrate that a special act was necessary in order to enable a Senator to get his salary?

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall answer that in a moment.

Mr. GEORGE. If it will not divert the Senator, let me ask him another question. The resolution to which the Senator has referred, in the matter of the Senator from New Jersey, was not approved by the Senate, was it?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have that appear in the RECORD.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have already stated that if that resolution had been approved it would, in my judgment, have been determinative of the pending matter.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is very clearly inferrable from the Senator's remarks, but the Senator referred to it as a resolution, which might carry the inference that it was adopted by the Senate.

On the other point, let me ask if a Senator is a Senator in the full sense from the date of the commencement of his term of office, why was it necessary to pass the act to which the Senator refers authorizing the disbursing officer of the Senate to pay his salary, inasmuch as the salary of Senators, of course, is fixed by law?

In the second place, let me ask the Senator, even if the Congress desired to pay salary to a Senator from the beginning of his term of office or from the date of his election, might it not be within the constitutional power of the Senate to do that, irrespective of when he actually became a Senator?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. GEORGE. I wanted to make that clear.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator may desire to ask me some further question when I invite his attention to another statute, about which I did not know at the time the minority report was prepared. As I stated awhile ago, I want to make certain that the record is accurate and complete, and for that reason I shall give to the Senate, although it may be used against the argument I make, the benefit of this additional statute.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Do I correctly understand the Senator from Delaware to say that a Senator becomes a Senator on the date when his term begins?

Mr. HASTINGS. If he is otherwise qualified. I repeat that at the time I prepared this report as far back as I had gone was 1883. There was an act in 1934 and an act in 1883; but I was curious to know why the act of 1883 was passed, and yesterday morning I made some further inquiry, and I found that under date of March 29, 1867, the following is found in the statutes:

> Each Senator, Member of House of Representatives, and Delegate in Congress, after having taken and subscribed the required oath, shall be entitled to receive his compensation at the end of each month at the rate now established by law.

Mr. President, I repeat that if that statute had been known to any of us we should have included it in the report made by the minority and commented upon it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, of course, it is very proper for the Senator from Delaware to call directly the attention of the Senate to that statute; but I beg to differ from the Senator when he assumes that we should have put it in the report. We might have, but not necessarily, because the view the minority take of the matter is——

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not mean the majority report; I referred to the minority report.

Mr. GEORGE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HASTINGS. I point out that, in order to be frank with the Senate, it would have been our duty, if we had discovered that statute, to have put it in also, because I was very greatly impressed with the fact that the Congress had passed these two acts putting Senators upon the pay roll at the beginning of their term upon the presentation of credentials that were regular in form; and it seemed to me it was inconceivable that the Congress would pass an act placing on the pay roll persons who were not at the time Members of Congress and paying them the salary of the Members of the Congress.

As I say, I think this act of 1869 takes away some of the effect of the argument we have made, at least upon my part; but I call to the attention of the Senate this fact with respect to the act of 1869: It may very well have been, and undoubtedly was, the policy of the Congress at that time to see to it that every man appeared at the bar of the Senate and took the oath as soon as possible after his term began; and I suggest that perhaps as a punishment for the Senator who did not come early he was not permitted to draw his pay. Perhaps that was what was in the mind of the Congress at the time they passed that act, rather than that persons were not Members of the Congress until they took their oaths. It is the one explanation which I make, and it seems to me it is not entirely unreasonable.

But, regardless of what may be said with respect to that, I call attention to this theory which I have with respect to the matter, and I particularly invite the attention of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] to it. My understanding is that the title to an office, if it is an elective office, is created when the election is over and the election officers have determined, in the way the statute provides, that a particular person has been elected to the office. If it be an appointive office, when the appointment is made the title vests in the particular appointee. In the case of an elective office, the credentials are necessary before there is evidence of the election. In the case of an appointment, the commission is necessary in order that there may be the evidence of the appointment.

We have in one case an elective office, and in the other case an appointive office. All that is left to make the title complete in the particular person is that there be some evidence of his acceptance of the office. If a man is elected, he may decline the credentials. If a man is appointed, he may decline the commission. That act of itself is sufficient to show that he has declined the particular office. If it be the case of a United States Senator elected in 1934, whose term begins January 3, 1935, when he is elected and receives his credentials, or if they are not delivered to him, when they are sent to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, if that is done with his approval, and his name is placed upon the pay roll, and he appoints his clerks just like a Senator who is elected and who is undoubtedly qualified, the only question about his acceptance of the office has passed, because those things of themselves show that he has accepted the office; and he thereby, if he is otherwise qualified, becomes a Senator of the United States. If it is an appointive office, and he evidences his acceptance in any way, by accepting the commission or otherwise, he becomes the person entitled to that office.

I heard the remarks yesterday and read the RECORD this morning with respect to what the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] said with respect to that matter; and I wish to call his attention to a fact in that connection. I first read what the distinguished junior Senator from Kentucky said, after the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] had yielded to him:

> Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say to the Senator that the argument he is advancing is entirely fallacious. The certificate of election which Mr. HOLT held was only an evidence of title. The title to the office was in nubibus.
>
> Mr. LOGAN. In the clouds. If he had presented that title here and it had vested in him in January, when he was ineligible to receive it, then his right to hold the office would have depended on the title which he had when it was vested in him; but he did not present it then. He did not present it until he was eligible to have the title vested in him.
>
> So clearly he is entitled to receive the office at this time, and that is the distinction between this and the other cases which have been cited here. That is the reason why the Senator from Arkansas is absolutely right when he says that if he had presented the credentials in January, when they could not have vested title in him because he was ineligible, he would have been out. But now he is 30 years of age, and he presents the credentials, and when he presents the credentials the title vests, and he is never a Senator until the title does vest, and when he asks that it vest in him, he is eligible to receive the title.
> If the Senator can answer that or overturn that suggestion, he will overturn the great body of the law that has been in existence and which constitutes the jurisprudence of the United States on nearly all questions similar to this. It is a question of when the title vests, when it ripens.
> When the credentials are tendered here there is a color of title, as it were. He holds the office, but under a mere color of title. Now the question is, Is he eligible to receive the title when he asks that it be vested in him? I have stated the reasons which have led me to support the report of the majority of the committee.

Then I called attention to the fact that the credentials had been presented; and the Senator from Kentucky replied:

> The title did not vest. He was not sworn. The title cannot vest until he takes the oath of office; then the title vests. The question is whether or not he is eligible when the title vests in him.

I think the Senator from Kentucky has stated the case accurately, but has reached the wrong conclusion. As I say, I think the title is in the Senator when he is elected, assuming that——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator now mean to say that he thinks the title is in a man when he is elected?

Mr. HASTINGS. The title immediately vests.

Mr. LONG. Then the Senator does not pay much attention to the courts, for they have held the other way.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; not on the question of title. The Senator is mistaken in that respect—not that he has to be qualified at that time, but the title vests when he is elected, assuming that he is eligible to take the office at the time his term begins. The title having been vested, he receives his credentials, which are evidence of it. The only other act is taking the oath, which is taking possession of the office.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will pardon me again, as I understand, the Senator is dividing the man's senatorial capacity into compartments. One is, he has a title. Another is, he has a right. Another is, he has an oath. Another is, he has a senatorship. As I understand, the Senator proceeds by degrees; but my understanding of the courts' decisions has been that a man has no title, he has no claim, he has nothing, until he has been accepted and accredited by this body.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well, Mr. President. Now, let me read from Mechem on "Public Offices and Officers" just a paragraph, at section 253, under the title "Qualifying for the Office."

SEC. 253. In general: The person elected or appointed to a public office is usually required by law, before entering upon the performance of his duties, to do some act by which he shall signify his acceptance of the office and his undertaking to execute the trust confided in him. This act is ordinarily termed "qualification."

The next section reads:

What constitutes qualification? This act generally consists of the taking and often of subscribing and filing of an official oath, and, in many cases, of the giving of an official bond in such a penalty and with such sureties as the law prescribes.

SEC. 255. Oath not indispensable: But although the law usually requires the taking of an oath, it is not indispensable. It is, as has been said, but a mere incident to the office and constitutes no part of the office itself.

A North Carolina case is cited, which I examined, and which seems to me to thoroughly justify the statement made.

I assume and my judgment is, that the principles I have laid down are sound, and I want to inquire for just a few moments as to the position in which Mr. HOLT finds himself with respect to that matter if my argument be sound.

He was elected in November 1934 for a term to begin January 3, 1935. He received a majority of the votes and, therefore, was entitled to the office if he had all of the qualifications for the office. When January 3, 1935, arrived the time had come when, under the Constitution, the successor of the man who had occupied the place up to that time should have begun his term, at noon on the 3d day of January.

It is admitted that on the 3d day of January, although Mr. HOLT had been elected, he did not have the title to the office because he did not have the qualifications for the office. Then may I inquire what happened to the title to the office? He did not have it on the 3d of January, or on the 3d of February, or of March, or April, or May, or June, but he waited until the 19th day of June. Where has the title to the particular office been in the meantime? Can he have a title to the office on the face of it and reach the time when the test of his qualifications for the office must be met, and merely because it was not determined by the Senate at that time, merely because the Senate did not say at that time, "Your title is defective because you have not these qualifications", can we, as the Senator from Kentucky says, leave the title somewhere up in the clouds, and draw it down from the clouds again, and make a good title out of something which has been dead for 5½ months?

The only reasonable conclusion we can possibly reach is that if the examination had been made by a body such as this body, which had to pass upon the case, at that time, or at any other time, and it had been found that the title at that time was defective, a good title could not possibly have been made out of it by waiting 5½ months.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. Did I understand the Senator to say that in the case of an appointment to the Senate to fill a vacancy the title vests at the time of the appointment?

Mr. HASTINGS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then how can the Senator reconcile what he has just said with the case which occurred when the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was appointed to the Senate, he at that time occupying the office of Secretary of the Treasury, which was inconsistent constitutionally with his being a Senator, and he continued to occupy that office for some months, until he got ready to come here and qualify, and then he was qualified without question?

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, at that time he could not have held the two offices, and he could not be qualified for both offices under the Constitution. That is undoubtedly true. That was not true, however, with respect to the Governors to whom the Senator from Louisiana referred.

Mr. BULKLEY. So long as the Senator contends that title by appointment vests as soon as the appointment is made, the case is not different.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. BULKLEY. We might as well meet it as if it were an election and the term had begun.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. BULKLEY. Clearly he would not be qualified to come here and take the office while he was Secretary of the Treasury. Clearly, then, the title must be held in suspense until he does come here. How can the Senator reconcile that plain matter of history, about which we all know, with the theory he is expounding?

Mr. HASTINGS. I reconcile it on the same basis on which I reconcile the Henry Clay case; it was because the point was not raised. But nobody will contend that he could have held the office as Senator while he was occupying the office of Secretary of the Treasury, under the Constitution.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course not, and he was not a Senator at that time.

Mr. HASTINGS. That particular point would not have been raised, because it could so easily have been corrected if it had been raised. Undoubtedly he would not have undertaken to draw his salary as Senator, and he could not have drawn his salary under the circumstances. All anyone had to do, if he wanted to, was to object, but it was not necessary to do that, because he could have gotten another appointment the same day the objection was raised. All this time he was capable of taking his seat in the United States Senate at any time he gave up the other office. I did not know about the case.

Mr. BULKLEY. There is no difficulty about the practice. The difficulty I have is that I understood the Senator to contend that it was not possible so to hold the title in suspense.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, that is true. Of course, it cannot be held in suspense, and it could not have been held in suspense in the case cited any more than it can in the case before us.

Mr. BULKLEY. I only say that he did it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Many things are done, such as that which has been done here. The title to the office in this case has been held in suspense, and no one has done anything about it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, that is just what we are contending, that it has been held in suspense until such time as the claimant is qualified to serve.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator and I do not agree about holding the title to an office in suspense. I think it cannot be done in any such fashion. Particularly is that true when the man who was appointed in the first place was not qualified to take the office. Of course, if he could have qualified the very minute when he received it, he could have handed in his resignation from the other office, and he could have qualified here.

Before I leave that point, I wish to refer to the question of the Governors, which has been mentioned. Of course, the Senate had nothing to do with that. Holding office as Governor of Louisiana, for instance, and being a Senator of the United States from Louisiana, so far as the Constitution is concerned, are things with which the Senate has nothing to do. That is only a matter of local laws, and that is true of many local laws. In many instances local laws do not permit any such thing. That is entirely up to them. That is not a thing for the Senate to be concerned about.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Using the Senator's own view of it, would it not be possible that the title to the office might vest, but the enjoyment of it might be held in suspense?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think, as I have undertaken to say, that the title to the office is one thing, the possession of the office is another thing. Therefore, one might wait for the possession of his office, which is taking the oath of office, but in the meantime, if he is otherwise qualified, he is a Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I wanted to ask the Senator's attention to what I believe on reflection he will concede to be an erroneous statement. The Governor of a State who is in office and who is elected to the Senate of the United States is not precluded from taking office here because of any local law. He is precluded upon the broad doctrine of incompatibility of duties and responsibilities. So that under practically all our cases, the Governor of a State, having been elected to the Senate of the United States, would not be permitted to take his seat here until he divested himself of the other and incompatible office.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether there is anything in the Constitution about that?

Mr. GEORGE. Not in the Constitution, but I thought the Senator's reference to local law meant only reference to the law of Louisiana.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I had reference to.

Mr. GEORGE. But it is a general principle, it has been ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States as well as by the State courts, and it rests upon the incompatibility of the duties and responsibilities of the office.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, Mr. President, the constitutions of most States with which I am familiar provide that no Member of the Congress may hold any office of profit within the particular States. The practice has been—and nobody has complained about it—that if a Governor wishes to fill out a few months of his term, although he has been elected to the Senate in the meantime, out of all sense of decency he does not undertake to take his office here, but when he comes to the Senate with his credentials and ready to take the oath, he has given up his office as Governor, and, of course, there is no question for the Senate, and no question raised in respect to the matter.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Would the Senator consider that at the beginning of the senatorial term for which the Governor was elected he possessed the qualifications to become a Senator?

Mr. HASTINGS. That he possessed the qualifications?

Mr. MINTON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. From the constitutional standpoint he possessed the qualifications.

Mr. MINTON. He must possess them at the time his term as Senator begins?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. MINTON. Not when he comes here to qualify.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true. The possession of the qualifications at the time his term begins is the test.

Mr. MINTON. Then if we should adopt the resolution proposed by the Senator from Delaware, it could never happen again that a Governor could be elected Senator, and serve out his term as Governor, and then come here and qualify after his senatorial term began. If we were to adopt the Senator's resolution, we should prevent any Governor in the future serving out his term as Governor after his term as Senator began, and then coming here and qualifying as a Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. Not by any means. The resolution which I have offered as a substitute is based upon the fact that at the time his term began, Mr. HOLT was not qualified to take this office. If the Governor of West Virginia had been elected—assuming that he was 30 years old and otherwise qualified, which I think is a fair assumption—if he had been elected, and had not come here until June 19, no question at all could possibly be raised with respect to it by the Senate. I might qualify that statement to this extent: If the Senate should find that someone had been elected to the office of Senator who arbitrarily refuses the office, it could, of course, if it so desired, declare the seat vacant, and that would end the matter so far as that particular person was concerned. However, that is something which never has been done, and is not likely to be done unless on some extraordinary occasion.

Mr. MINTON. Does the Senator think that a Governor who has been elected Senator, but who had not served out his term as Governor, could come here and be sworn in as Senator and also continue to serve as Governor?

Mr. HASTINGS. When he presented himself here, so far as the constitutional requirements are concerned, he would fulfill them; and, so far as I know, it would be no business of the Senate further to inquire into the subject.

Mr. MINTON. Then the Senator would hold that the question of the incompatibility of the offices was no concern of the Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. To be perfectly frank about the matter, I had not considered that feature of it. That also might be a very different question, and a very serious question. The fact that no one has ever undertaken to do it—I suppose probably no decent person would try to do it—makes it an unimportant thing to try to determine.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. It may not have any direct bearing upon the issues in this case, but it certainly would be within the power of the Senate to say to anyone who was holding an office which was incompatible with the duties of the office of Senator, "Your holding of that office is an election to decline to accept the office of Senator"; and if the office of one who is elected to the Senate is an office under the United States—getting entirely away from the doctrine of incompatibility, and coming back to the Constitution—it certainly is true that the Senate would have the power to say that continuance in the office under the United States is an election to decline, or abandon the office of Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. In the latter case to which the Senator refers, it would not only be the right but I think it would be the duty of the Senate to exclude the man.

Mr. GEORGE. I may call the Senator's attention to the fact that the House of Representatives acted upon precisely that state of facts in the case of one who was elected to the House, who was also the holder of an office in the Army of the United States. The House resolved that the office which he held in the Army was an office under the United States, and his continuance in that office was an abandonment of the congressional seat to which he had been elected. I have no doubt that the Senate can act in the same way, even in the case of a State office, which is in fact incompatible with the office of Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, Mr. President, if the Senate desires to do so, it can act wholly arbitrarily and do exactly what it pleases with respect to any Member of the Senate, without rime or reason, because the Constitution gives it such authority. It is not assumed that the Senate will do any improper thing, but the assumption is that it will do only those things which, under the Constitution, the conscience of its own Members impels it to do.

Mr. President, yesterday I called attention to this provision in the Constitution when the Senator from Texas was delivering an address to the Senate:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] was not impressed with my interruption, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] made some comments to the effect that when the framers of the Constitution desired to fix a thing definitely they said so, and clearly intimated that in his judgment this provision of the Constitution had nothing to do with the subject under discussion.

It may not have a very direct bearing upon the subject, but I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the language is "during the time for which he was elected." Is there any possible excuse for applying that provision of the Constitution to Mr. HOLT, for instance, if it be true that he is not a Member of the Senate until he takes his oath?

Why should he be interested, and why should he be put in the class of Senators and Representatives, and, during the time for which he was elected, prohibited from doing certain things. If the framers of the Constitution were writing this provision in the Constitution for some particular purpose, I should like to know why it did not take care of a case such as this, where it is admitted that Mr. HOLT has not done anything in the Senate since January 3, has not qualified during the term, and could not qualify if he desired to do so.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course the purpose of the constitutional provision to which the Senator is now alluding was to prevent any Member of the Senate during the time he was elected Senator from obtaining the advantage of an increase in pay which was voted to any other officer, so as to remove, I presume, the inducement to vote for increase in pay in some other office, and then go out and get appointed to it, and derive the advantage of such increase in pay. I suppose what was in contemplation there was appointment to office subsequent to service in the Senate, and not prior to service in the Senate. However, I can conceive that the same reason against it would apply with respect to a man's accepting any office of profit under the United States before he qualified as a Senator.

The point, however, which I intended to make to the Senator was that while, as he agrees, it is very doubtful whether that language has any direct bearing on the point we have been discussing, it does have the bearing that where the framers of the Constitution really intended that their prohibition should extend to the whole term for which anyone was elected they knew how to say so, and proved that they knew how to say so; but with respect to the provision we are discussing they did not say any such thing. They said:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not—

So-and-so.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course the Senator from Ohio will recognize that this provision as to a man being appointed to a civil office during the time for which he was elected Senator undoubtedly would also apply to a man who was appointed to the Senate, rather than being elected, and who served but a short time. However, in the case of an appointment to the Senate, it would apply only to the time he served. In the present case this language will apply to Mr. HOLT; and, although he does not take office until 5½ months after his term begins and could not take office during that time, here is a provision of the Constitution which applies to him, without any reason appearing for its applicability, it seems to me, unless it was intended by the Constitution that a man should be a Senator from time his term began; that he had the title to his office from that time; that all he needed to do was to take the oath and qualify and take possession of the office.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, the prohibition applies only to an office the emoluments of which are increased or an office which has been created during the time for which the Senator was elected. I really see no relevancy there. It is not contended that Mr. HOLT has accepted or has intended to accept any such office.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to another point. Let us look at the provision of the rule of the Senate with respect to the oath which shall be taken:

The oaths or affirmations required by the Constitution and prescribed by law shall be taken and subscribed by each Senator.

As I understand the theory of those joining in the majority report is that a man is not a Senator until he takes the oath. However, our own rule provides:

The oaths or affirmations required by the Constitution and prescribed by law shall be taken and subscribed by each Senator.

It ought to have said "by each person elected to be a Senator" if it be true that he cannot become a Senator until he has taken the oath of office. That rule of the Senate, of course, has no such binding effect as has the Constitution, but it is supposed to follow the Constitution.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, by the same token we contend that that rule means that a man shall not perform any duty and shall not, in effect, be a Senator until he takes the oath.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think if the rule were being rewritten, in view of this argument, the drafters would probably be a little more careful about it.

I should like to inquire, so that we may know definitely, is it the contention of the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Ohio that Mr. HOLT might have been excluded upon the application of any Senator, after the fact had been ascertained at any time between January 3 and June 19, or would the question have to be raised only by the affirmative action of Mr. HOLT in appearing here?

Mr. BULKLEY. I have never examined the question as to whether Mr. HOLT could have been excluded on some Senator's motion. I presume there must be some limit of time, as the Senator himself has well said, beyond which a Senator could not properly refuse to come here and qualify. The Senator well said, in the course of his remarks, that the Senate must have a remedy if a Member-elect arbitrarily refuses to come here; and, if the question had been raised upon that ground, we do not know but that the Senate might have had some remedy. Clearly, we do take the position that if Mr. HOLT had entered the Senate and taken the oath of office we would have been obliged to unseat him under the precedent in the Shields case.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have not made myself entirely clear, or else the Senator from Ohio has not answered my question. What I want to know is this: If, for instance, on January 3, last, I had brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that the Senator-elect from West Virginia was not qualified to take his oath because he lacked 5½ months of the proper age, and I had presented to the Senate the affidavit of someone who knew the fact and proposed a resolution that the seat should be declared vacant, is it the position of the chairman of the committee and others urging the adoption of the resolution proposed by the chairman that such a proceeding would have been in order, and, that being a question of high privilege, the Senate would have been compelled to determine that question then? I will be very frank with the Senator.

Mr. BULKLEY. I will be equally frank. That question was never considered in the committee, to my knowledge, and I have not arrived at any conclusion on it, nor do I think that question is now before us.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; that question is not now before us, but may I call the attention of the Senator to this point, which to my mind is very important? If that should be the decision of the committee or of the Senate, and we could have that question definitely determined, there would not be any great danger in the precedent established in seating Mr. HOLT, because the question then could be raised by any Senator in this body; and if that be true, the Senate would be compelled to decide it, but what distresses some of us is that Mr. HOLT can wait until the 19th day of June before presenting himself and therefore prevent the Senate from acting upon the case. I think it very important that this debate show whether or not that is the position of those representing the majority opinion.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am glad to help the Senator clarify that question so far as it may be clarified. Certainly the committee has not presumed to find that Mr. HOLT had a right to wait so long. The point that we have reported is that having waited so long, and not having been declared ineligible, there is no ground upon which to declare him unqualified at this time, he now having attained the age that is required by the Constitution.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator from Ohio answer the question from his own point of view? Does the Senator from Ohio think the question might have been raised in the meantime by any Senator and therefore been a proper subject of inquiry by the Senate?

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, in a broad way, any Senator may raise any question that he thinks desirable to have raised, and I am frank to say to the Senator that I would not be able to answer how I would have voted on that proposition without further study than I have given it. I will say to him, with equal frankness, that had Mr. HOLT presented his credentials and been sworn in on the 3rd of January I would have voted to unseat him.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Following out the line of questioning the Senator has indulged in, suppose, for argument's sake, we admit it either way, that the Senate could have inquired or not have inquired, as it saw fit, what difference would it make? Suppose we make an investigation and find that somebody has been elected to the Senate and has not come here and taken the oath of office, what are we going to do about it?

Mr. HASTINGS. Declare the seat vacant.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Suppose we go ahead and declare the seat vacant, that does not fill the seat.

Mr. HASTINGS. But the seat then is in the position of any other seat that is declared to be vacant.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but that does not get us out of the dilemma.

Mr. HASTINGS. We do our part; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. What do we accomplish by doing our part?

Mr. HASTINGS. We have told the State from which that particular person comes that the seat of that particular person the State sent here is vacant; and if the State wants somebody to represent it, it is up to the State to fill the vacancy.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose, as has often occurred, the State has elected its Governor to the Senate, and, for one reason or another, he has not presented himself here, and he remains in the office of Governor, as, I think, has happened in some cases, for more than a session of Congress, and does not pay any attention to us, admitting that he is qualified, ought we to declare the seat vacant?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. We ought to ignore that situation?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. But, in the Senator's judgment, if a State elects somebody as to whose qualifications we can find some complaint, then we ought to take it up?

Mr. HASTINGS. The difference—and it is a very great one according to my point of view—is that one is qualified, and, being qualified, the Senate is not particularly concerned because he does not present himself here; but in the other case, where he is not qualified, it becomes, in my judgment, the duty of the Senate to the particular State involved to say that the person they have sent here is not qualified and that a vacancy exists, so that the State may fill that vacancy.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how the Senate, if it wants to take such action, and investigate men who do not present themselves here, can accomplish anything by it. If a man, qualified or unqualified, does not present himself here, it seems to me that the Senate is perfectly helpless and that it cannot take any action; it can acquire no jurisdiction until the man presents himself here, whether qualified or not.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was trying to find out exactly what is the sentiment with respect to such a situation; and I particularly inquired of the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], who is interested in it. I am glad, however, to have the Senator from Nebraska state his views with respect to the suggestion. My views are entirely different from his.

Mr. NORRIS. I merely want to get the Senator's viewpoint. His argument may be entirely correct; and I am not seeking to accomplish any particular thing; but I want to know where our duty leads us.

Mr. HASTINGS. I know that.

Mr. NORRIS. What is going to be accomplished by it? It will be conceded, I think, that we cannot compel a State to fill a vacancy.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. We cannot compel a man who has been elected to come and take the oath of office if he does not want to do so.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Then let me get the Senator's idea as to this point: The Constitution provides that a minority of the Senate cannot do business, but can adjourn from day to day and can compel the attendance of absent Senators. Would the Senator now say that under that provision we would have the right to compel someone who had not been sworn in to come here and attend the sessions of the Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. If there was evidence here by the presentation of his credentials, I should unquestionably say that we had the same right over him that we had over any other Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose his credentials had not been presented?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have undertaken to state my position as being this: The only way in which he can escape is to present some evidence, or there should be some evidence in existence, indicating that he is not going to accept the office. For instance, suppose a man elected to the office of Senator, even if his credentials had come here, had announced that he was moving to England and going to live there the remainder of his life; I do not know what that particular State could do about that situation, the State having elected him for 6 years could not declare a vacancy. He may have gone, he may be abroad, he may be abroad permanently, and the people of that State, interested in being represented, present to the Senate a memorial calling attention to the fact, which is well known, that the man elected had not accepted the office—and if he had accepted it, being in England, we probably could do nothing about it—and was away. If such a memorial were presented here, I think nobody would doubt that not only would the Senate have the power but it would have the responsibility to declare a vacancy. The Senator from Nebraska asks why; what good would it do? Because the only way by which a State can be represented is after we have declared a vacancy or it may be that the State might assume a vacancy to exist and send a man here; and based upon that we might act.

Mr. NORRIS. Great respect as I have for the Senator's opinion, it seems to me he has presented a case that is very simple. Suppose we had that kind of a case, that a man properly qualified and elected went to England and remained there, whether he has abandoned the office or whether it should be declared vacant would be a question to be determined by the facts. It would be a question of fact which somebody would have to determine. Ultimately, I concede very frankly, the Senate could do just what the Senator said it ought to do, because, as we know, the Senate is supreme. It can punch a hole in the Constitution if it wants to do so now. In fact, we are acting now just like the Supreme Court; that is, we are supreme. We can break the Constitution all to pieces.

It seems to me this is what would have to be done. The State would first determine the facts. The State would perhaps make an investigation of some kind. The way to bring the question to the Senate and secure final action would be to appoint or elect someone to take the office and let him come here with the credentials. Then we would have the question before the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. Undoubtedly we would have the question then before us, but does the Senator from Nebraska think that is the only duty we have with respect to it, and that we have no duty until that is done?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of any duty. Much as I think the question ought to be settled by some constitutional provision or some law, I do not see how we have any duty to perform, because there is no way for us to compel a State to act. If the State sends no one here, I do not know what we can do about it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Suppose the Governor of West Virginia had assumed there was a vacancy after it had been definitely determined that Mr. HOLT could not take his seat until June 19, 1935, and had on the 1st day of April sent to the Senate an appointee, someone who was unquestionably qualified, and had done it upon the theory that, because this young man was not of age on that date he could not take his seat, the State of West Virginia ought to be represented by someone who was qualified at that time?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator presents a very fair question. If I took the Senator's attitude, which I concede he has good reason and logic for taking, and the Senate should take the same attitude, we would receive him. We would say there is a vacancy; not having the qualifications at the beginning of the term, he never can qualify himself; hence it would follow there would be a vacancy. We would have the same question presented that we have now.

Mr. HASTINGS. Not quite the same question, at least from the point of view of the committee. My understanding is that it is admitted by the majority of the committee—I do not know whether the Senator from Nebraska admits it or not—that if this young man had appeared at any time prior to becoming 30 years of age the Senate would have had to reject him.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think that is the position of the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is that the position of the Senator from Nebraska, too?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, there is another thing to which I wish to invite attention, and that is the statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] yesterday to the effect that because he was in the Philippines on Government business and did not return here until February 7 to take the oath of office he was only a Senator-elect. I should be sorry if I believed that were true. There is nothing in the practice or precedents of the Senate to warrant any such view.

The Senator from Tennessee has been in the Senate since March 4, 1917. He is number 10 or number 11 in seniority in the Senate. Yesterday he placed himself in exactly the same position as other Senators, for instance, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and several others. He placed himself in exactly the position of those Senators in whose terms of service there was a break.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does the Senator contend that our present courtesy with respect to recognizing seniority within the Senate has any bearing on the constitutional question?

Mr. HASTINGS. Undoubtedly it has. It has been the construction of the Senate of this constitutional provision ever since the practice was begun. The practice of the Senate upon a point like this, upon a doubtful question, is one of the best ways in the world by which we can find out how the Senate construes the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not contending that any position we may take will be clear of doubt if we follow it through to its conclusion. I think we will run against a stone wall, no matter which side of the question we take, if we follow it to its conclusion.

In view of the statement of the Senator, suppose a State elects a man who possesses all the qualifications necessary for taking the office of United States Senator. According to the Senator's idea he is a Senator; but suppose he does not present himself; suppose he goes along a year without presenting himself and is not sworn in, and then goes to England and announces publicly that he has gone there and intends to stay there 4 years more. He takes out naturalization papers in Great Britain. Has he been a Senator of the United States during that time?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not know that it is worth while to try to add any further argument, but I have stated several times that my theory is that when a man is elected to this office and is qualified to take the office at the beginning of his term, he gets with that election a title to the office; he gets his credentials which are the evidence of the title to the office; and the only thing left for him to do is to take the oath of office. I have read an authority, which I think is a good authority, to the effect that taking the oath is merely incidental, its principal purpose being to show that he has accepted the office.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator admit, which I think his answer to my question does admit, that the man who has become a citizen of Canada or of Great Britain or of Germany after he has been legally elected with all the qualifications, but not sworn in, has in fact been a Member of the United States Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. If he has done all the things necessary except to take the oath of office. I think when he does not appear here, when he goes to Canada or England or some other place and announces he has gone, that rebuts the presumption of his acceptance of the office. The acceptance of the office cannot be full and complete, and the evidence of it cannot be full and complete, until he takes the oath. Until he takes the oath, that evidence of his acceptance can be rebutted. I should say if he went to England and announced that he had taken out citizenship papers there, it would rebut the evidence of his acceptance, and then we would have the question before us.

Mr. NORRIS. It also might be true that when he went to Canada he had no intention of giving up his citizenship; that he intended to come back and be sworn in as a Senator; but when he got over there he liked the country and finally took out citizenship papers and renounced his allegiance to the United States. If the Senator's contention be correct, he would have been a Member of the United States Senate. Does the Senator think if he took the oath of office and came here it would not add to his title? Would it not follow, in the opinion of the Senator, that that would have been the capsheaf which would have made him a Member of the United States Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. Any other Senator would be in the same position. If a man is a full-fledged Senator who has never presented himself to the Senate and never taken the oath of office, then that man would be a Member of the United States Senate. I understand that to be the contention of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me go back a moment to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who said he was not a Senator from January 3 until February 8. Bear in mind that he was elected to succeed himself. His term, under the Constitution, definitely ended at noon on January 3, 1935, and under the provisions of the Constitution the term of his successor began at noon on that very day. With respect to the question of his accepting the office, bear in mind that the Senator from Tennessee was away on official business; he was engaged on business of the Government. According to his own statement, he did not recognize that he was not a Senator until he found he could not be paired here.

To my mind it is unreasonable to say that he did not remain in the Senate of the United States. It is unreasonable to say that under such circumstances he lost his place of seniority, or his pay, or anything. He did not lose anything under those circumstances. He had the title to the office. Nobody else had the title to the office. There was an interval of less than a moment between the time he went out and the time he came in under a new title to an old office which he held, and he carried that on. Certainly all our records show that his term began then, and all of us assume that his term began then; and I think we get ourselves in very great difficulty when we change that practice.

I listened with great interest to the argument made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] the first time I ever gave any consideration to the subject, and I thought his conclusion was correct. I am told that there was some talk about the matter in the Judiciary Committee. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] may remember it. I was not there; but if we could have decided the question then, when it did not affect any particular individual, and was not complicated by any particular sympathy affecting anybody, I have a notion that that resolution might have been adopted by a substantial majority.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator know that that resolution was aimed at the position of Governor which I was occupying in Louisiana at the time?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am frank to say that if that had been known, it might have prejudiced some people; but I did not know it.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Mississippi so stated on the floor of the Senate at the time.

Mr. HASTINGS. My recollection is that the Senator from Mississippi inquired whether or not it did in any way affect any particular individual.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the Senator from Nevada disclaimed any such intention.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no!

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, it does not make a bit of difference.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask the Senator one more question; then I shall not interrupt him any more.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Nebraska has made me break a little further into the realm of imagination.

Suppose a man who was elected to the United States Senate went to England, and the King took a liking to him, and they put him up as a candidate and elected him to the House of Parliament: Would he still be a Member of the United States Senate and a member of the House of Parliament?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have repeatedly said that whenever a Senator did anything which indicated that he had abandoned his office, that would be the end of it.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say upon this subject.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have just a few remarks to make in the nature of a reply to some of the suggestions which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. I shall take only a few minutes.

When this matter was first presented to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I was somewhat confused about it. I am frank to confess that I thought perhaps there was a very serious question as to whether Mr. HOLT should be seated; but I have recently been ill, and had not much else to do, so I have read the briefs and some of the precedents, or supposed precedents, and I have reached the conclusion that this is a very simple case, and that there is no room for doubt about what should be done.

I reached that conclusion, I may say, absolutely free from all partisanship. Some of the newspapers have indicated that we were going to overturn the Constitution. I saw an editorial in the Washington Post a day or two ago saying that we were going to overturn the Constitution if we voted to seat Mr. HOLT. The man who wrote that editorial, of course, never read the Constitution, or, if he did, he did not understand it, because no one contends that the Constitution has anything to do with this particular question; at least, I have not heard it.

It was also stated in the same editorial that the precedents established in the past settled the matter. There is not a single precedent to be found anywhere.

It is very unfortunate that loose newspaper talk creates the impression on the minds of the public that this distinguished body has no regard at all for the Constitution. I say, it is exceedingly unfortunate.

Addressing myself for just a moment to the statements made by the Senator from Delaware as to when a person receives title to an office, he read from Mechem on Public Office, I believe, which is a splendid authority, and no one can find any fault with what he read. The only trouble, so far as the Senator from Delaware is concerned, is that the text which he read does not support his conclusions at all.

Election to office or appointment to office does not confer title to the office upon the appointee or the one who has been elected. I believe the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] was correct when he said that the courts, so far as I know, have uniformly so held.

Let us take the case of a sheriff in a county. He is elected, we will say, in November. He receives his certificate of election. He is required to qualify in January by the execution of a bond and by taking an oath of office. When the time comes he fails to make a bond. He never receives title to the office, because he did not do those things which the law requires he shall do before he shall have title to the office.

So far as the case of a United States Senator is concerned, I cannot see that there is much room for argument about it. I do not care what Senators may have said in the past, or what loose statements may have been made; but I believe all of us must conclude that no man can become a Senator in the Congress of the United States until he has accepted the office, and that he can accept the office only by placing himself in the position required of him by the Constitution of the United States.

What is required of him? No one may be a Senator in the Congress of the United States until he shall be bound by an oath or affirmation that he will support the Constitution of the United States. That is written in the Constitution. We do not have to go to rules which have been adopted by the Senate, neither do we have to go to laws which may have been passed by the Congress. It is written in the Constitution in this language:

> The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution.

Until one who may have been elected to the Senate of the United States is bound by an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution he can never be a Senator, regardless of the courtesies that may be extended to him by law or rules because he is a Senator-elect.

I desire to make a statement which I think is conclusive if anyone will reason about the matter just a little. I convinced myself that my superficial opinion about the matter was wrong, and I did so by giving some consideration to it. Let me make this statement:

No State has to fill the office of Senator, nor can it be compelled to do so; and the failure of a State to elect someone to the office of Senator does not create a vacancy that can be filled by appointment.

I recall that a good many years ago—in fact, I believe it was before I was a voter—we had a very heated contest for United States Senator in Kentucky. I think it was in 1896.

Former Senator Joe C. S. Blackburn had been nominated by the Democrats, and W. Godfrey Hunter had been nominated by the Republicans. At that time a Senator was elected by joint session of the general assembly in Kentucky. There were two or three recalcitrants who could not be brought into line, and the result was that throughout the entire session the balloting continued; and when the 4th of March came, when the Senator should have been elected so that he could take his seat, he was not elected. The balloting continued for some months, and the time came when the legislature was forced to adjourn by reason of a State constitutional provision.

At that time—and I am speaking wholly from memory; I have not looked up the matter since; I do not know what the records show about it, but I do know what happened—the then Governor of the State designated a man, whose name I think was Wood, to fill a supposed vacancy caused by the failure to elect someone before the beginning of the next term. Mr. Wood was never seated. The balloting went on until the next year, in 1897, and then the legislature elected a man to the Senate.

I should like to ask this question of some of the distinguished Senators who disagree with me: Let us suppose that when the legislature was first balloting for the election of a Senator in 1896, during the winter, there had been some young man in the legislature, as there was, who was not 30 years old at the time, but there was no election. The next year, in 1897, he was 30 years of age. Would anyone contend that the General Assembly of Kentucky did not have a right to elect that man, although 1 year of the term had already expired? I think no one will so contend.

Then from this and from other precedents which I am quite sure the records of this body will show, we deduce this statement:

The legislature of a State—and that is true under the Constitution as originally written—fixed its own time, unless Congress might in some way interfere when it would elect a Senator. It could wait a year of a term before it elected a Senator if it so desired, and that was done many times in the old days, when there were the deadlocks in the State legislatures. The legislature could wait a year, the legislature could wait 2 years, and when it did elect, of course, the man took his seat, and the question was not whether he was qualified or not on the first day of the term, but whether he was qualified on the day when he was elected or when he presented his credentials to be sworn. I do not think that can be disputed.

If a State may wait a year, or 2 years, or 3 years, to elect a Senator, can it not elect one before the beginning of a term, with the understanding that it will be five and a half months before the man so elected shall take his seat? It does not seem to me there can be any dispute about that.

Now I wish to say just a word or two about the question of title. I want to make myself clear about that because that is what got me confused in the first place. Those lawyers who have been engaged in the general practice of the law throughout the year know what we mean when we talk about a title. There is color of title. There is offer or tender of title. There are all kinds of titles, but when we get down to the last analysis, title vests only when the man to whom it is offered accepts it in the way the law requires him to accept it.

The State of West Virginia did not have to fill this vacancy, if it was a vacancy—and it was not a vacancy under the rule of the Senate. They could have waited until June, or waited until next year, if they had so desired, to elect a Senator, or they could have elected one, so far as the Constitution is concerned, before the seventeenth amendment, 2 years or 3 years or 4 years before the beginning of the term. There is nothing in the Constitution to prevent that.

We find that when West Virginia elected Mr. HOLT to the Senate in 1934 they gave to him a paper, a certificate of election, and they said to him, "This is evidence of the fact that the voters of the State of West Virginia have selected you." There was no way Mr. HOLT could have become a United States Senator save through the acceptance of that office in the way the Constitution requires, and that is that he must present himself at the bar of the Senate and take the oath of office.

No one contends, of course, that the Constitution says he must do that on the first day of the term. The legislature could have waited until the term was half out if it had so desired. The important thing is that when he does present himself and asks to accept the title in a legal way, he must be eligible to receive the title.

What was the trouble, we will say, with Gallatin or with Shields? They had the evidence of title, they presented it to the Senate, and they allowed the title to vest in them when they were not eligible to receive the title, and because of that the entire validity of the title depended upon their condition at the date and at the time it was vested in them. It could not become good thereafter. The tree must lie as it fell, and if the title was bad when it was vested in them, then when the question was brought before the Senate it follows as a matter of course that the Senate should have held that they had tried to accept the title when not eligible to accept it.

I contend, Mr. President, that when Mr. HOLT waited he had a right to wait. No one had a right to complain except the State of West Virginia. The Senate had no right to complain. The Senate would have no right to complain if the State did not send a Senator here at all. It could do nothing about it. No one except the State of West Virginia could complain, and the State of West Virginia had sent young HOLT here saying, "We know you will not be eligible under the Constitution until the 19th day of June, but as we have the right not to send you at all, or have the right to wait a year or 2 years, we will elect you and send you there, knowing that you will not be 30 years of age until the 19th day of June, when you may accept the title."

The people of West Virginia had a right to do that. There is nothing in the Constitution which prevents it. There has been nothing in the history of the Senate in the way of precedents which prevents it. Unless we change the Constitution, unless we throw the Constitution aside entirely and write into it things which are not there and have never been there, and have never been considered there, we cannot deny Mr. HOLT his seat.

It is said that if he had come here on the 3d day of January and presented his credentials and had been sworn in his title would have been bad. That is very true. He would have committed suicide so far as his life as a Senator is concerned if he had come and presented his credentials, and no one had objected, and he had taken the oath. He would have had a title that could have been attacked at any time, because he would have had a title that could not have been vested in him.

Mr. President, I think that I have said all that I could say. It seems to me the question is very simple, indeed. I do not question the motives of those who disagree with me about this. I think they have failed to go into the matter and to give it that consideration which it really deserves. I believe very earnestly that if some of the able Senators on the other side, whom I have heard argue, should go into the question, and go to the very genesis of it, if they should take the time when they could sit down quietly and have opportunity to think until they had reached a conclusion, I believe they would change from the conclusion which they have assumed at this time, because it is only by a change of position that they would be right, and I know they want to be right.

So far as I am concerned, it will be a very great pleasure to me to cast my vote, if I have the opportunity, for the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and against the substitute offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	Keyes	Overton
Ashurst	Copeland	King	Pittman
Austin	Costigan	La Follette	Radcliffe
Bachman	Davis	Logan	Robinson
Bailey	Dickinson	Lonergan	Russell
Bankhead	Dieterich	Long	Schall
Barkley	Donahey	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Bilbo	Duffy	McCarran	Sheppard
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Shipstead
Bone	Frazier	McKellar	Smith
Borah	George	McNary	Steiwer
Brown	Gerry	Maloney	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Gibson	Metcalf	Townsend
Bulow	Glass	Minton	Trammell
Burke	Gore	Moore	Truman
Byrd	Guffey	Murphy	Tydings
Byrnes	Hale	Murray	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Neely	Van Nuys
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Wagner
Chavez	Hatch	Norris	Walsh
Clark	Hayden	Nye	Wheeler
Connally	Johnson	O'Mahoney	White

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not had opportunity heretofore today to announce the absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] on account of illness. I ask that the announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the question before us has been so fully debated yesterday and today that I do not consider it necessary to repeat very much of what has been said, and there is very little which can be said without a measure of repetition.

The question we have to determine must be voted upon not with a view to what we think would be a good policy in the matter, but with a view to what we believe the constitutional requirement actually to be.

The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has suggested that the majority of the committee is endeavoring by a short-cut to amend the Constitution. With due respect, it seems to me that it is he and not the majority of the committee who seeks an amendment of the Constitution. The Constitution requires certain qualifications as to eligibility with respect to the office of President of the United States. The word "eligibility" is not used in that clause of the Constitution relating to the qualifications for Senator. The Constitution provides, as we have heard many times, simply that no one shall be a Senator until, among other things, he shall have attained to the age of 30 years. So the sole question is, When does one come to be a Senator?

The Senator from California frankly admits that an elected candidate does not become a Senator merely by the commencement of his term of office. Therefore, it seems to me he cannot escape the conclusion that by insisting that the candidate must be qualified as of the beginning of his term of office he is writing into the Constitution that which does not there appear.

The minority opposed to the seating of Mr. HOLT is split in its views on the question of when one becomes a Senator. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] take the view that one does become a Senator as of the beginning of his term of office. All I have to say about that proposition is that it is not in accordance with anything that has ever been held by the Senate and is in discord with the accepted precedents under which one Senator after another, subject when elected to disqualifications which would have made it impossible for them to assume the Senatorial office, have come here and been allowed without objection to take the oath after the disqualifications had been removed.

If we should adopt either of the minority views with respect to this matter, we would have to overrule decisions of the United States courts; we would have to overrule precedents of the House of Representatives. Concededly there is no precedent directly in point in the Senate.

The majority of the committee have taken the position that we are prepared to recommend that the resolutions adopted in both the Gallatin and the Shields cases should be overruled, but not the result declaring the claimants ineligible. We contend that the only question before the Senate in any of these cases has been whether the claimant presenting himself was qualified to serve as a Senator.

In the Gallatin case and also in the Shields case the Senate went beyond the simple finding that the claimant was not qualified to serve, and adopted resolutions declaring that the election in each case was void, but for reasons which are not consistent with each other. The resolution adopted in the Gallatin case in its fair meaning holds that the election was void because the claimant did not possess the necessary qualifications as of the time of election. Whether it meant that or not, those who discussed and debated the Shields case, those who voted for the resolution which was adopted in the Shields case, thought it meant that, and intended to amend it, and so it appears they intended to discard the Gallatin precedent and establish a new precedent. The new precedent which they established was correct insofar as it determined General Shields to be not qualified to hold the office at the time he presented himself. We submit that it was not correct in holding that the election was void because he was not qualified as of the time of the beginning of his term of office.

The issue was not very clearly drawn in that debate as between the view that the Constitution related to the time of the commencement of the term or of the time of taking the oath by the claimant, and for a very simple reason. The term began on the 4th of March and the claimant took the oath on the 6th of March, so that for the purpose of determining his qualification to serve, there was no difference between the two points of view. He was disqualified to serve both at the time of the beginning of his term and at the time that he took the oath.

Reference has been made to the opinions expressed by the distinguished Senators who took part in that debate. I shall take but a moment to allude to an opinion expressed in that debate by Senator Butler, of South Carolina, who was one of the leading proponents of the resolution which was finally adopted. Being asked whether it would be possible for General Shields to become eligible by postponing a vote on the proposition until December, when the 9 years' citizenship requirement would have been satisfied, Senator Butler replied:

> My judgment on the subject is, that if General Shields had not taken his seat at all, perhaps at that time he might have claimed it.

In other words, the resolution was not necessarily intended to conclude what would have happened if the facts before the Senate had been what they are here today.

In the case before us today the claimant has not taken his seat while under any constitutional disability, and therefore, according to the opinion of one of the leading proponents of the Shields resolution, he might perhaps be entitled to claim it now, notwithstanding the Shields resolution.

The resolution adopted in the Shields case was that the election—

> Was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

How long did that resolution stand in those words? It stood only until that very same Senate met again in December of the very same year and passed upon the qualifications of the very same man. I have before me the Congressional Globe showing the proceedings for Monday, December 3, 1849. It there appears as follows:

> Mr. Mangum—

Senator Mangum was one of those who in the debate advocated the adoption of the resolution excluding General Shields in March—

> Mr. Mangum presented the credentials of the Honorable James Shields, of Illinois, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Illinois for the term of 6 years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1849, which were read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Shields, and he took his seat in the Senate.

All of that happened without objection, in the very Senate every Member of which knew that he was not qualified to serve as at the beginning of the term of office for which he was elected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Had not Senator Shields been reelected?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes. I am coming to that. However, the point I am stressing is that the resolution which originally excluded General Shields, says that he was not qualified to serve unless he was qualified at the beginning of the term for which he was elected, and that is not true, as the very same Senate found out later on. Qualification to serve depends upon other considerations.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator; but when Senator Shields was reelected in October, I believe it was, when he had attained 9 years' citizenship, while the resolution may have said he was elected for 6 years, he was only elected for the remainder of the 6-year term.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; but that is quite contrary to the argument the Senator was making yesterday, that Senators may be elected only for 6 years.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I said, except where there is a vacancy. If the Senator will look at my remarks in the RECORD, he will note that I said that Senators had to be elected for a term of 6 years, except in case of vacancies. My contention is that in the case of General Shields there was a vacancy in the office, because he had been unseated; that is, when he was reelected he was simply elected for the unexpired term.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator cannot, consistently with his own theory, say that General Shields was reelected, because the first election was held void.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course it was held void.

Mr. BULKLEY. So he was elected in October, not to fill a vacancy, according to the Senator's theory, but he was then elected in the original instance.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, the Senator from Texas does not mean that he was legally elected the first time. I said "reelected", and I meant that in the sense that there was another election.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; they had another election. Furthermore, I wish to be quite frank and say to the Senator that when the legislature did elect General Shields in October 1849 they took the precaution to say that they were electing him for the remainder of the term; but, none the less, he was elected for the term that began on the 4th of March, because the legislature cannot change the term; the terms are fixed pursuant to the Constitution itself; and whatever the legislature says, the term, none the less, begins on the 4th day of March. I have read from the Globe exactly what happened; that the credentials were presented for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, when every Member of the Senate at that time knew that General Shields was not qualified to serve as of the beginning of that term.

The point I am emphasizing is that the rule stated in the resolution in the Shields' case is not correct without qualification; and if we should now undertake to follow it without qualification, we would be undertaking to give it a greater force than the very Senate which adopted it gave to it. But when we come to apply it with qualifications, then what result do we have? The same man, having been elected after the completion of the 9 years' requirement as to citizenship, was held qualified to serve, and the Senate admitted him without any question. The October election was for the same term that General Shields had been held not qualified to serve on the ground he had not been naturalized 9 years before its commencement on March 4.

It is in accord with the precedent of the December action of the Senate in the Shields case that we submit that the Senate must now seat the claimant from West Virginia. All argument as to what might have happened had this question been raised in some other form before the present claimant attained the required age is not in point here; it is a mere academic discussion. The question which is before us today is that we have a claimant here presenting himself with perfect credentials from his State, and having attained at this time the age required by the Constitution.

No vote against seating him will have the effect of preventing anyone not presently qualified under the Constitution from serving in this body. We cannot write into the Constitution that a Senator must have been qualified as of the date of the beginning of the term for which he is elected. The precedent which seems to point to such a course was, as I have shown, set aside and disregarded by the very Senate that created it.

So, I repeat, if we are not to give this claimant his seat, we will overturn court decisions, House precedents, and the accepted practice of this body. If we adopt the views of the majority of the committee, we will act in accord with every precedent which has been known or mentioned, except as to the wording of two resolutions, both of which have already been overruled and superseded before we are called upon to act.

I respectfully submit, Mr. President, that we cannot, in good conscience, vote against the seating of the claimant who comes here with proper credentials and with the qualifications required by the Constitution.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. President, I desire to submit a brief observation on this question. The doctrine of stare decisis has no place in the consideration of this question or in controversies of this nature in the Senate. The precedents and the cases which have been discussed have a historic value and are very interesting, but they really have no bearing on this question, because those cases are not analogous to the case now before the bar of the Senate.

The question resolves itself, in my mind, to this: Here is a Senator, duly accredited by the lawful authorities of the sovereign State of West Virginia, seeking to take the oath of office; he is 30 years of age; he is a citizen of the United States, and he is an inhabitant of the State of West Virginia. He complies with every qualification demanded by the Constitution. So, stripped of all argument and all verbiage, how can we escape these pregnant facts? I do not see how anyone can successfully challenge the validity of the election in West Virginia under which this gentleman has received the certificate of the duly constituted authorities of West Virginia; and so long as the commission which he holds cannot be successfully attacked; and so long as the Senator-elect, Mr. HOLT, complies with all the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, he is entitled to his seat as a Senator in this body.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, William Pitt, the Great Commoner of Britain, became a member of Parliament when he was only 27 years of age. Soon after he began to discharge his legislative duties, he was vehemently disparaged because of his extreme youth by the able, elderly Sir Robert Walpole. Mr. Pitt in his reply to Mr. Walpole said, among other things:

> The atrocious crime of being a young man, which the honorable gentleman has, with such spirit and decency, charged upon me, I shall neither attempt to palliate nor deny, but content myself with hoping that I may be one of those whose follies cease with their youth, and not of that number who are ignorant in spite of experience.

Never since the day of this famous verbal conflict in the British Parliament has a great national legislative body magnified the offense of being young to the extent that it has been stressed in this Chamber during the last 30 hours.

Let us hope that the distinguished Senator-elect from West Virginia, Mr. HOLT, will, with becoming fortitude, endure the temporary affliction of being young, find much encouragement in the eloquent reply of Mr. Pitt, and a full measure of consolation in the thought that ultimately, passing time will completely heal the harmless infirmity of which his future colleagues now so vigorously complain.

For 2 days in succession we have witnessed an extraordinary procession of the ghosts of departed greatness. Under such consummate commanders as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] the specters of Albert Gallatin, General Shields, Daniel Webster, and John C. Calhoun have been marched and countermarched around the Senate Chamber in fascinating and bewildering formations for the purpose of creating an atmosphere in which the present Membership will, regardless of existing circumstances, vote as Senators voted in the long ago.

Precedents a hundred and forty years old, which were bad in the beginning and have become intolerable in the light of the knowledge and necessities of the present age, have been plausibly and eloquently invoked by those who seek to persuade the Senate to deprive Mr. Holt of the seat in this body to which the voters of West Virginia elected him by an overwhelming majority last November.

Some of those who have argued against the seating of Senator HOLT have made themselves more famous by splitting hairs than Abraham Lincoln ever made himself by splitting rails. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Permit the Chair to state to the occupants of the galleries that there must be no signs of approval or disapproval. Occupants of the galleries are here as guests of the Senate and will be permitted to remain only so long as they abide by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, these ever-recurring, never-ending metaphysical arguments concerning the constitutionality of senatorial action make some of us feel like the hero of the following story, which is told by our famous former colleague, Tom Heflin, of Alabama:

Once upon a time, after a long-continued and disastrous drought, an old colored brother in praying for rain said: "Good Lord, send us a rain. Send us a real rain. Send us a gully-washing rain. Send us a rain that will make the ears of corn grow a foot and a half long, because we are all dead tired of the infernal nubbin-shucking that's been going on in this community." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we are likewise tired of the constitutional "nubbin-shucking" that has been going on in the Senate.

The opponents of the pending resolution have endeavored to fortify their arguments by again and again asking, in effect: "What does the precedent in the Gallatin case say? What does the precedent in the Shields case say? What did Calhoun say? What did Webster say?" Let me, as one of Mr. Holt's enthusiastic defenders, inquire: "What does justice say? What does common sense say? What does common decency say?" By the oracles of the latter instead of the deliverances of the former will the Senate be governed in its action today.

A year ago, the members of the Democratic Party in West Virginia were called upon to nominate a candidate for election to a seat in this Chamber. They were neither ignorant nor unmindful of the simple, unambiguous language of the Constitution concerning the indispensable qualifications of a United States Senator. They knew that their nominee must eventually withstand the acid test of conforming to the following:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

In these circumstances Mr. HOLT became a candidate for the Democratic nomination for United States Senator against a field full of other distinguished men, including a former United States Senator, a former nominee for Governor of the State, a former Member of the House of Representatives and former Speaker of the West Virginia House of Delegates, and a former Chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

From the day that Mr. HOLT announced his candidacy he was, through the newspapers, by means of the radio, and on the hustings charged with ineligibility on the ground that he was not 30 years of age and would not have attained that age either on the day of the general election or at the beginning of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. The allegation that if Mr. HOLT were nominated and elected he would have to wait until his thirtieth birthday—June 19, 1935—to take his seat was broadcast to the voters of West Virginia times without number. But in spite of the fact that an unparalleled effort was made to defeat this able and deserving young man, he received more than twice as many votes in the primary as were cast for any of his opponents. After Mr. HOLT was nominated, the broadcasting of his alleged ineligibility was continued, envenomed, and increased.

Mr. HOLT from the beginning of his campaign for the nomination to the end of his campaign for election, with praiseworthy candor, informed more than 50 West Virginia audiences which he addressed, face to face, or by means of the radio, that he would not be 30 years of age until the 19th day of June 1935. In at least one radio address, which it was my pleasure to hear, he stated that if he were elected he might not be permitted to take his seat until he had attained the age of 30 years, in which event West Virginia would be deprived of his services as a Senator for a period of about five and a half months. But he happily added that it would be better for West Virginia to be without a Senator such as she desired for 6 months than to be without such a Senator for 6 years.

The voters of West Virginia, with little regard for party ties and less for partisan propaganda, accepted Mr. HOLT on his own terms, waived every alleged infirmity that had been attributed to his youth, confidently reposed their trust in the favorable decision which they believed the Senate would render, and elected Mr. HOLT by a majority which, subject to a single exception, greatly exceeded the majority by which any other Democratic candidate in the State was ever elected to office.

Today West Virginia, through the feeble instrumentality of the speaker, informs the Senate that Mr. HOLT, whom she last November elected to membership in this body by a most decisive majority, has attained the age of 30 years, that he has been a citizen of the United States 9 years and more, and that he was when elected, an inhabitant of the State of West Virginia for which he was chosen.

Inasmuch as no one here or elsewhere has ever denied or questioned a single one of these assertions of eligibility, and since Mr. HOLT's qualifications fulfill the requirements of the Constitution in every particular, West Virginia appeals to this body to ratify the choice which her voters made at the polls by awarding Mr. HOLT his seat in the Senate.

When West Virginia was a part of the Old Dominion State, Patrick Henry, one of Virginia's most eloquent sons, on a memorable occasion said: "Give me liberty or give me death!" The people of West Virginia, in the matters of nominating their candidates for office and selecting their public servants, share the noble sentiments so impressively expressed by Patrick Henry, whose name they love and whose memory they shall never cease to revere.

Today West Virginia says to the United States Senate: "Give me the liberty of representation in the greatest legislative body in the world by persons of my own choice or give me death." If the Senate should, to the unspeakable surprise, regret, and grief of West Virginia, refuse her the boon of representation for which she prays and pronounce a death sentence upon her political freedom of choice, she will, subject to slight variations, say in the language of the immortal Nathan Hale: "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for the political liberty of this Republic."

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask my distinguished friend the Senator from West Virginia a question before he takes his seat?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEELY. With pleasure.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Does the sole and senior Senator from West Virginia assure the Senate that his sovereign State has not authorized or attempted to authorize any representative from West Virginia other than the Honorable RUSH D. HOLT to be seated here as junior Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, that assurance is unconditionally given to the Senate and the world.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I also inquire, as one Member of the Senate who has not as closely as some others analyzed the record in these proceedings, whether, as stated this afternoon by the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] before the eloquent Senator from West Virginia took the floor, Mr. HOLT is 30 years of age, is a resident of the State of West Virginia, has been a citizen of the United States for more than 9 years last past, and is thus qualified at this time to meet the tests imposed on a Senator of the United States as declared in the Constitution?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] has, with his characteristic clearness, correctly stated the important facts about which he has inquired. The unhesitating answer to his question, and to every part of his inquiry, is in the affirmative.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] as a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] on behalf of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Keyes	Overton
Ashurst	Copeland	King	Radcliffe
Austin	Costigan	La Follette	Robinson
Bachman	Davis	Lonergan	Russell
Bailey	Dickinson	Long	Schall
Bankhead	Dieterich	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Barkley	Donahey	McCarran	Sheppard
Bilbo	Duffy	McGill	Shipstead
Black	Fletcher	McKellar	Smith
Bone	Frazier	McNary	Steiwer
Borah	George	Maloney	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	Gerry	Metcalf	Truman
Bulkley	Gibson	Minton	Tydings
Bulow	Glass	Moore	Vandenberg
Burke	Gore	Murphy	Van Nuys
Byrd	Guffey	Murray	Wagner
Byrnes	Hale	Neely	Walsh
Capper	Harrison	Norbeck	Wheeler
Caraway	Hatch	Norris
Chavez	Hayden	Nye
Clark	Johnson	O'Mahoney

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask to have read the resolution offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] as a substitute for the resolution offered by myself on behalf of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the substitute resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the election of RUSH D. HOLT to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having attained the age of 30 years at the commencement of the term for which he was elected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute resolution.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. NEELY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). Present.

Mr. DIETERICH (when Mr. LEWIS' name was called). I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. On this question he is paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay" on this question, and if the Senator from New Jersey were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BULKLEY (after having voted in the negative). I announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessarily absent from the city. As I am advised that a special pair has been arranged for him on this question, I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COPELAND. When I came into the Chamber I was not sure about my pair, but I find he is not present. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. LOGAN], and to state further that if present he would vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the pair of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] and the pair of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]. All these Senators are necessarily absent. If present, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] would vote "yea", and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] would vote "nay." The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] would vote "yea", and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] would vote "nay."

Mr. KING (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KING. I have a pair with the Senator from Idaho on this question and therefore withdraw my vote. I do not know how the Senator from Idaho would vote if present, but I understand he would vote "nay."

Mr. MCKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. On this question, however, he has a special pair, and I shall therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on important public business.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—17

Austin	Dickinson	Keyes	Vandenberg
Borah	Gibson	McNary	Walsh
Burke	Hale	Metcalf

So Mr. HASTINGS' resolution in the nature of a substitute for the resolution submitted by Mr. GEORGE on behalf of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] on behalf of the committee.

The resolution submitted by Mr. GEORGE (S. Res. 155) is as follows:

Resolved, That RUSH D. HOLT is entitled to his seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of West Virginia, it appearing that he was 30 years of age at the time when he presented himself to the Senate to take the oath and to assume the duties of the office.

Mr. NEELY. I call for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULKLEY (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement heretofore made, that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessary absent, but a special pair has been arranged for him, and I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement as to my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], I withhold my vote.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], who is unavoidably detained. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BARKLEY (when Mr. LOGAN's name was called). Repeating the announcement previously made concerning the unavoidable absence of my colleague, I wish to announce that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair that I made on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. It has been announced that if he were present he would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]; and

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

I am informed that if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] were present and voting they would vote "nay", and that if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] were present and voting they would vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on important public business.

Mr. DIETERICH. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. LEWIS]. He has a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. If my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea." I am informed that if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] were present and voting he would vote "nay."

The result was—yeas 62, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—62

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this vote the yeas are 62 and the nays are 17, so the resolution is agreed to, and the Senator-elect from West Virginia will present himself at the Vice President's desk to take the oath of office.

Mr. HOLT, escorted by Mr. NEELY, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath of office was administered to him by the Vice President.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7205) to amend the Ship Mortgage Act, 1920, otherwise known as "section 30" of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920, to allow the benefits of said act to be enjoyed by owners of certain vessels of the United States of less than 200 gross tons.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CONNERY, Mr. RAMSPECK, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. WELCH, and Mr. LAMBERTSON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 28, 42, 44, and 48 to the bill, and concurred therein, and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18 and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE, NINTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

Mr. BANKHEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5917) to appoint an additional circuit judge for the ninth judicial district. If it appears that it will occupy any of the time of the Senator from Alabama, of course, I shall not ask that the bill be taken up; but I make the request now because the Judiciary Committee is familiar with the measure, it has reported it favorably, the Department of Justice has requested that it be passed, and that it is a matter of more or less emergency in the organization of the court in the district affected. If it shall cause any discussion, I will withdraw the request at once.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California if a bill did not pass the Senate only a few days ago providing for two judges for the southern district of California and an additional circuit judge?

Mr. JOHNSON. It contained various amendments, and it was sent to the House for its consideration. The House has now passed a bill and sent it to the Senate providing for the appointment of one judge. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, will, from that committee, present an amendment providing for the two judgeships to which the Senator from Utah refers.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that the House passed a bill to provide for an additional circuit judge for the ninth circuit. That bill went to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee reported the bill favorably, adding additional judges for the southern district of California, in which district the business of the courts is badly congested. There were other judgeships proposed. I regret that we have not been able to complete the investigation of other districts. This is all we can do at this moment.

I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona a question. I have introduced a similar bill with reference to an additional judge for Oklahoma. I was not quite clear as to the statement of the Senator from Arizona. Is it the desire of the Senator that this bill should be taken up now and passed?

Mr. ASHURST. I am speaking only for myself. I am not authorized to speak for any other member of the Judiciary Committee. My personal opinion is that there should be an additional district judge in Oregon, in West Virginia, in South Dakota, and in one or two other States. However, we must be practical. It is useless to delay action in this matter until we can have additional judges provided in other districts.

Mr. GORE. What about Oklahoma?

Mr. ASHURST. Oklahoma needs an additional judge. Tennessee is another State which I know needs an additional judge. Those two come to my mind as States which need judges, but obviously they cannot be provided for at this time. Moreover, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary have not completed investigation of the Oklahoma and Tennessee cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, two additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same compensation as the present district judges of said district, and one additional judge of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Ninth Judicial Circuit, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. In the event a vacancy occurs in the office of the district judge now senior in date of commission in said district, and who was appointed under the act of September 14, 1922, such vacancy, and succeeding vacancies in the same office, shall be filled without further action by Congress.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2 of the committee amendment, after line 8, it is proposed to insert a new section to read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, a bill making this authorization has already passed the House of Representatives. The testimony shows that at Norfolk, Va., the maritime cases alone occupy more than two-thirds of the time of the judge for the eastern district of Virginia. The calendar is dreadfully congested. I understand that the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, during the past few days a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee held a hearing on the amendment now offered by the Senator from Virginia. I wish to say that in the hearing we went into the matter at length during almost an entire afternoon; and we find a condition in the eastern district of Virginia which is indeed deplorable when we consider what should be the efficiency and promptness of the Federal courts. They are in many instances more than a year behind with their work. In most instances they do not have a call of the calendar because it would be impossible for them to do anything under such a call. However, Mr. President, the amendment providing for one additional judge for the eastern district of Virginia is all that the Judiciary Committee has considered along this line, excepting the consideration of the main judgeship bill, now before the House. There are, perchance, other districts which may or may not require an additional judge, but in orderly procedure the Judiciary Committee has made investigation. Each case should stand on its own merits, and it seems to me to be unfair to load this bill down with amendments to take care of cases in which no investigation has been made by the Judiciary Committee.

As for the eastern district of Virginia, there can be no question that it should have an additional judge. As for the southern district of California, it is so palpable and so plain that there should be two additional judges there that there can be no contradiction. As for the one additional circuit judge for the ninth circuit, the congestion there has been made note of by the Department of Justice and the judicial council.

The bill, as amended by the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Virginia, should be passed, and then we should let the Judiciary Committee go into the subject in an orderly way and examine the other cases on their merits.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if he can give us any assurance that the Judiciary Committee at any early date will proceed to a consideration of these other bills and will take such action as the circumstances in the districts seem to demand. Of course I assume they will do that.

Mr. McCARRAN. I cannot speak for the Judiciary Committee, and I do not assume to, but I speak for the subcommittee of which I happen to be a member, and that subcommittee, if it is referred to us, will so far as I am individually concerned, go to work on it at once.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not wish to obstruct the passage of this bill or to defeat the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, but my own State stands in pretty much the same situation. We are in dire need of an additional judge. I introduced a bill providing for an additional judge some weeks ago, Senate bill 2137. I have been hoping for a favorable report at the hands of the Judiciary Committee, but the Department of Justice seems to have a sort of ironclad rule that it will not recommend an additional judge unless some institute of law or other organization recommends it in advance.

Justice delayed is justice denied. Where additional judges are needed I think the Judiciary Committee ought to ascertain the facts and recommend the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator inadvertently indulged in a criticism of the Department of Justice which is scarcely warranted. I know from my inquiries and my contacts with the Department of Justice, and particularly with the Attorney General, that an investigation is conducted whenever representations are made as to the importance and necessity of additional judges; and I have upon my desk in my office reports concerning a number of judicial districts where it has been insisted that additional judges are required. Those reports will be available to the Judiciary Committee, and the Judiciary Committee will be glad to pass upon any matters which come before it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I understand a departmental report was made on my bill; and I have been informed that the law institute, or whatever organization it is which is expected to pass on the question, did not make a recommendation in that particular instance, and for that reason the Department of Justice has withheld its recommendation. I hope the Senator from Utah is right in his contention. I have been informed that the Attorney General's view is that we are entitled to a judge and we ought to have it, but that was not embodied in his report.

That was not embodied in his report. I shall not interpose any objection. I shall rely upon the assurances which have been given on the floor that the matter will receive early attention, and, I hope, favorable attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to provide for the appointment of two additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, one additional judge for the circuit court, ninth judicial circuit, and an additional district judge for the eastern district of Virginia, and for other purposes."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, ask for a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed Mr. KING, Mr. MCADOO, and Mr. BORAH conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BYRNES submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 6, 7, 19, 26, 27, and 29.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 38, 39, 40, 43, 45, 46, and 47, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$175,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,062,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed by said amendment insert "three"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 34: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$11,020,450"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$40,732,310"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,590,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$6,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 18, 28, 42, 44, and 48.

(Except as to amendment no. 32),
CLARENCE J. MCLEOD,
J. W. DITTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report. There was a unanimous agreement, and I am sure there will not be any debate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have been waiting for an opportunity to submit a few remarks on the President's recent message. Of course, I do not want to deprive any Senator of his privilege to dispose of any important business. May I ask the Senator from Alabama if it is his purpose to speak this afternoon on his bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is.

Mr. LONG. Would there be any objection if I should speak for a few minutes? I have the right to do so, I know, but I do not want to insist on it. I send to the desk and ask to have read the marked portion of an article which appeared in a newspaper this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana for that purpose?

Mr. LONG. I have the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I have the floor, and I do not yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Louisiana permit me to dispose of the conference report?

Mr. LONG. I have a right to speak on the matter.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I assured the Senator from Alabama I would not ask him to yield if the conference report should lead to any debate. As it seems that it will, I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws his request.

Mr. BYRNES subsequently said: Mr. President, I renew my request for the consideration of the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, which has been presented and is on the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the report was considered and agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following action of the House of Representatives, which was read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
June 21, 1935.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 28, 42, 44, and 48 to the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, and concur therein; and

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert a comma and "and other officers above such grades employed on such class of active duty (not to exceed 4 months in any calendar year) shall not be entitled to be paid a greater rate of pay and allowances than authorized by law for a lieutenant of the Navy or a captain of the Marine Corps entitled to not exceeding 10 years' longevity pay."

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18.

The motion was agreed to.

FARMERS' HOME CORPORATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2367) to create the Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy, to engage in rural rehabilitation, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this bill was considered by the Senate for 9 or 10 days when it was here on a previous occasion. It has had most thorough and active consideration by the Senate in all its phases. Its provisions were gone into very thoroughly when the bill was previously before the Senate. After full consideration a number of amendments were adopted in the Senate before the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill went back under an order of the Senate which contained directions to the committee to report the bill again by a date therein fixed. The committee again considered the bill and sometime ago submitted a report. I am pleased to say that all the members of the committee who were in attendance—and there was a large attendance—were in accord as to the principal features of the bill as it has been reported to the Senate. The bill has received the support of nearly all the members of the Committee of Agriculture and Forestry.

I think it would be proper to state, in a brief way, the changes which have been made in the original bill. I may say in the beginning that the amendments which were adopted by the Senate when the bill was previously here for consideration were all included in it as reported at this time with practically no change.

The bill as at present before the Senate provides that the Board shall be composed of 5 members, 2 being ex-officio members, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Governor of the Farm Credit Agency, and that not more than 2 of the 3 appointive members shall be of the same political party. That amendment was adopted without objection when the bill was before the Senate on a previous occasion.

It is further provided that the capital stock of the Corporation may be increased only with the approval of the President of the United States. The bill originally made the first working capital of the Corporation $50,000,000, in the discretion of the President. As reported now by the committee, that is made mandatory. That sum is carried in the work-relief law, under an authorization in that act, included in it by the Senate when the measure was here for consideration, specifically providing that funds appropriated in that act, under an amendment offered by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], could be used for the purpose provided in the bill now before us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. KING. I inquire as to the reason why it is to be made mandatory that the capital stock shall be $50,000,000? Why not just give the authority, if we are to pass the bill, and provide that $50,000,000 may be the maximum capital of the Corporation, instead of compelling them to have capital stock of that amount?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all they are authorized to have under the bill, except where the President approves more. It was thought, upon further consideration of the bill, that the Corporation should have some fixed capital stock which would be definite and certain.

Mr. KING. If I may trespass further upon the Senator's time——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. KING. I am interested in what the Senator says. Does he state that the bill contains not only a positive declaration for $50,000,000 capital stock but that the President may increase the capital stock?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. KING. Without any limitation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The limitation is such subscription as he may wish to make out of the work-relief act, from the sources from which the Senate authorized him without limitation to make subscription.

Mr. KING. Then the President might subscribe for $500,000,000 and take it out of the appropriation we have made for relief?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senate took whatever action has been taken on that matter in passing the work-relief joint resolution. The bill simply follows the provision in the work-relief act which was passed by the Senate.

Mr. KING. I desire to say to the Senate that I am very much opposed to that provision and shall move to strike it out.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me, if I recall the terms of the amendment, that there is a slight inaccuracy in the statement of the Senator from Alabama with reference to the capital. If I read it correctly, the board of directors may increase the capital to any amount they desire—not the President, but the board of directors—and the President may allocate such funds as he thinks advisable from the work-relief appropriation. In one instance it is the board of directors who are given authority to increase the capital stock, and the other authority is given to the President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I call the Senator's attention to page 16, line 16:

> The Corporation shall have capital stock in the amount of $50,000,000, and the board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to increase such capital stock—

And so forth. That amendment, " with the approval of the President ", was incorporated in the bill on the floor of the Senate when the bill was pending here before, so that without the approval of the President there is no authorization in the bill as it is now written for the board to increase the capital stock.

Mr. ADAMS. But the actual act of increasing the capital stock is that of the board of directors.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; but, as I stated, it must have the approval of the President.

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the Senator why there is to be recourse for these contributions to capital stock not only to the Work Relief Act but to the particular sections of that act which provide money for soil erosion, reforestation, and other purposes which are of particular interest to certain sections of the country?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, the source from which the money comes is not made mandatory in the bill. It is left, as the Work Relief Act leaves it, in the judgment and control of the President. There are certain phases of the program of rural rehabilitation whose assets, when the temporary machinery shall have expired, it may be desired to transfer to this Corporation; but there is no mandatory provision here to take any part of this money from any specific allocation as set up in the Work Relief Act.

Mr. ADAMS. If I may interrupt further, as I read the provision, it says that—

> The President is further authorized to transfer to the Corporation, from the sums so allocated or otherwise made available for rural rehabilitation, and prevention of soil erosion, reforestation and forestation, such sums as he may from time to time deem desirable to carry out the purposes of this act.

In the Work Relief Act these were not allocations, but were limitations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. The President was authorized to spend $4,000,000,000, but of that amount only a certain amount could be devoted to these purposes. As I understand, there is a demand—almost an excessive demand—for funds for those particular purposes; and my inquiry is whether, if we provide for this particular allocation or limitation, we shall not deprive the work-relief program of funds which are vitally needed if it is to be carried out as the President desired it carried out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that he observes that that is not a mandatory requirement. I will say to him further that it was put in the bill at the suggestion of the department which will have charge of this work, after the bill went back to the committee. That is the reason why the provision is in the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. It may be satisfactory to the department, but it will hardly be satisfactory to the section of the country which is to be deprived of necessary appropriations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is nothing at all mandatory about it.

All the property of the Corporation, except its real estate, including its franchise, capital, reserves, and surplus, its loans and income, and its personal property, is made exempt from taxation as Government property. Any land sold to a purchaser, however, although title may still be retained by the Corporation, is subject to taxation.

An important provision of the bill which has satisfied some Senators who made known their opposition to the bill when it was pending here before is the limitation upon the expenditures in the early stages of the operation of the Corporation. It is now provided in the bill that during the first year only the $50,000,000 which is fixed as the limit of the working capital coming from the Work Relief Act may be expended by the Corporation; and then, within the first 3 years of the life of the Corporation, that only $300,000,000 may be expended.

So this program provides limitations for the Corporation which will require it, in the early stages of its development and of its research and of its organization, to move with some degree, at least, of deliberation and care; and it gives the Congress ample time subsequently to determine whether they wish to put a stop to a program of this sort or enable it to go forward. With that limitation upon the expenditures for the first 3 years, a number of Senators who previously opposed the bill have indicated their support of it.

The employees are placed under the civil service, as provided in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and adopted by the Senate. No change has been made in that amendment.

The appointment of any person receiving a salary of $4,000 or more per annum is subject to the confirmation of the Senate. That amendment was adopted heretofore, and has been incorporated in the redraft of the bill.

The Corporation is also required, at the close of each fiscal year, to make a report in writing to the Congress stating in detail its activities, the names, salaries, and duties of all employees and officers in the employ and under the supervision of the Corporation, and an account of all moneys it has disbursed. In other words, it is provided that there shall be furnished annually a detailed statement, for the information of the Members of Congress, of the complete operations of the Corporation in all its ramifications and details.

There was considerable discussion here when the bill was previously considered about the limitation upon the amount of expenditure and the size of the farms. After full discussion, the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] upon that subject was adopted, and it has been incorporated in the bill.

It fixes an average, according to the census, applicable to the size of the farm in the State or locality, and also to the value. It seemed to the committee that that was a wise amendment. The amendment brings about a safe and careful limitation which is adjustable to different sections of the country according to size and values of farms in the different sections.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator state where that limitation is to be found in the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. On page 22, line 9, subsection (4). In addition to that, the bill now provides that no land shall be bought by the corporation for resale to farmers until it has been appraised by competent appraisers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is a very important provision of the bill. Will the Senator state it in detail?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will turn to page 22, line 15, he will find the provision:

> No property, real or personal, shall be purchased hereunder save upon an appraisal by competent experts, reported in writing and sworn to and filed and preserved for inspection by the Congress, or any Member thereof.

That was adopted here on motion of the Senator from North Carolina. The committee added this further safeguard:

> If the services of appraisers of the Federal land bank are available, no farm land shall be bought by the Corporation save upon an appraisal by one or more appraisers of the Federal land bank, reported in writing and sworn to and filed and preserved for inspection by the Congress, or any Member thereof.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is observable that the proposed statute does not fix any limitation on the amount which may be paid for the land. It merely provides that the purchase shall be based upon an appraisal.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not understand the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill provides that the property must be appraised; but there is no provision that the purchase price shall be limited to the appraised value, is there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that is really covered. If the Senator will observe just preceding that, there is provision for limiting the purchase by the words, "not to exceed in cost the price of property of similar size and value in the same section or area." The value, of course, is to be determined by the appraisal, and the Corporation will not be authorized to pay in excess of the appraisal.

The provision as to the limitation on the value is followed by a provision for a method of fixing the value, that is, by the appraisal, and naturally it seems clear, at least to me, that the Corporation would be governed and limited by the value ascertained in the way and by the persons provided.

Mr. BORAH. In what line does the language in reference to the limitation on the cost appear?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is line 13, page 22, "not to exceed in cost the price of property of similar size and value."

Mr. BORAH. That is a different limitation. Should there not be somewhere a provision, as suggested by the question of the Senator from Arkansas, that it would be limited to the appraised value?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am perfectly willing to have such an amendment adopted, if the Senator will prepare it. It is the object of the framers of the bill to limit it to that, and if the Senator does not think it clearly so provides, I shall be glad to accept an amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I am not sure it does not clearly make such provision, because I have not sufficiently studied it, but it ought so to provide.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I agree with the Senator, and I shall be glad to have the Senator clear up any uncertainty in his mind about it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Because of the amortization period over which loans might be cared for under the proposed act, the corporation created would have to be a corporation of very long life. I notice on page 21 the statement that—

> The Corporation shall have succession in its corporate name and shall have power.

Then there is a recitation of many powers. Is there any provision in the bill limiting the life of the corporation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is not. It will be of indefinite duration.

Mr. BONE. I understand the necessity for indefinite duration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Government can abolish it, of course. It is a Federal corporation we are proposing to create. It will continue as long as it is carrying on the program under the measure.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The Senator will remember that in the committee discussions the question was raised as to the appraisal of separate tracts. I am wondering whether the language on page 22, where it is stated on line 15 "no property, real or personal, shall be purchased hereunder save upon an appraisal" is sufficiently clear. I am wondering whether we should not add the words "of each tract."

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is all right to add those words if the Senator thinks they are needed. That is the object and purpose. It says "no property", therefore there would be an appraisement of each tract.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The danger against which we were trying to guard was having an appraisal of a large area which might contain some land which would be of more value than other land and having it all appraised at $10 an acre.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator has any doubt about it, I suggest that he prepare an amendment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I shall be glad to prepare an amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. On page 26 will be found an amendment which was presented by the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] fixing an exemption up to $2,500 beyond which the purchasers of a farm could not place any lien or encumbrance of any sort on it. It would exempt it as a homestead from debts or obligations of any kind except taxes. That is intended to preserve, so far as the Government can control it, a continuity of ownership.

Mr. BONE. This virtually establishes in a statutory way a homestead in the land such as might be secured by the establishment of a homestead under the operation of State laws.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. I take it that it was the purpose of the committee virtually to vest all rights of homestead in one of the borrowers under this measure?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BONE. I think that is a very salutary provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. All of us who have studied this problem and are interested in it are anxious to provide every reasonable safeguard to hold the title in the continued ownership of the purchasers of these farms and to prevent the loss of homes through speculation or bad judgment or bad business management.

Mr. BONE. Is there any limit to the size of a tract which may be purchased? I am sorry that I was not permitted to hear the committee deliberations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], as I pointed out, offered an amendment, which will be found on page 22, line 9, which sets up a standard which is applicable and which gives a proper and reasonable latitude as to the size and as to the value of farms to fit conditions in varying sections of the country, limiting it to the average farm.

Mr. BONE. I realize that it would probably be impossible to set an arbitrary figure as to acreage because of the factor of diversity in crops in so many States. There are some very large farms in my State, and also some very small farms. There are in States like Texas some farms which would seem inordinately large. That is particularly true in Western States, where the people have to engage in dry farming, and must have large amounts of land in order to produce a sizable crop. Is it the idea of the Senator from Alabama that the provision in the bill is sufficiently flexible to give authority for the exercise of wise discretion in the matter?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill provides for an average farm. No one could expect a tenant or owner, under these conditions, to have a farm larger than the average-size farm in his community, whatever it may be.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the bill says " an average farm in the State where the land is located."

Mr. BANKHEAD. That makes it flexible enough to provide for a wheat-growing section or a cotton-growing section.

Mr. BONE. Every Senator, of course, will have to answer questions about this bill, and while the Senator from Alabama is on the floor I desire to extract from him all the information I can. I do not know how it is in the Senator's State, but in my own State, on the east side, there are some very large farms given over to the production of wheat. On the west side there are a great number of small truck farms, as we call them, where the farmers produce vegetables of a very fine kind. There would not be any comparison in size between the farms on one side of the State and those on the other side of the State. I do not know how it would be in Alabama or in the Eastern States, from which many members of the committee come. They perhaps have a different situation.

I do not wish to suggest this as an amendment, but I am wondering if it would not be better to provide that the farms should be limited to the average size of the farms in the locality in the State; or would that be unhappy language?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is not contemplated to buy large farms.

Mr. BONE. I appreciate that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And if one gets an average-size farm in his State, I think that is a larger-size farm than will ordinarily be sold to these new farm owners. To be perfectly frank with the Senator, I think this provision is fully liberal as to the size of the farm. Some Senators feared that too large farms might be bought, and I think that was the cause motivating the Senator from Oklahoma to present his amendment.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, this measure is going to offer the first ray of hope to a great many people. I am very much in sympathy with the type of legislation involved in the bill. I realize that perhaps some political bureaus might look upon this as something so new that it could not be tolerated, but I think it is a very wise and salutary suggestion in the form of legislation.

Since all the Members of the Senate are soon going to have to go home and talk to their constituents about this subject, I think it is wise for us to clear up as many of these small points as we can while the Senator is going through the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am glad to answer any questions.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Permit me to call to the attention of the Senator from Washington the fact that this exemption goes far beyond the explanation. The explanation was that it protected the borrower. This clause makes the exemption a covenant running with the land. In other words, the borrower may sell the land to the richest man in the community, and so long as it is used as a farm homestead it continues exempt from all debts, all obligations of every kind.

I can readily imagine that there might be in the State of Washington some thrifty man who would accumulate a series of adjoining tracts of this kind, and all would be used as farm homesteads, and all would be exempt from all debts, and all would still be homesteads.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, would the Senator from Alabama object if we should indulge in a little colloquy? Is it the view of the Senator from Colorado that this characteristic of a legal homestead might be impressed on these individual tracts of land even though they were subsequently assembled in the legal custody and possession of one individual?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; they could still be homesteads.

Mr. BONE. If the Senator from Alabama thought that might cause some trouble—and I suppose there is always a possibility of trouble from the land sharks somewhere down the line—it might be possible, by the interpolation of some sort of language, to prevent such a situation from arising. I know that the Senator from Colorado, as are other Senators, is familiar with the homestead provisions.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. In my State it might be possible for the owner of property to own it under State laws under which he could accumulate land, and he could have a separate homestead under this provision. The bill, as it is drawn, forbids either voluntary or involuntary liens upon the property. It seems to me that if the provision which now reads " during the occupancy of the borrower " were changed to read " during the time when the indebtedness remains unpaid ", it would accomplish everything that it is desired to accomplish. But the committee amendment goes beyond that, and provides an exemption which will protect people in whom we have no interest, perhaps—that is, the transferees who may accumulate, as I say, a series of these exempted tracts—and in the wheat-growing section, where a wheat farm may cover a thousand acres, there may be only one farmhouse, and it would be a farm homestead, and yet it may be composed of half a dozen farms purchased under the provisions of this measure.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Senators' idea is that the characteristics of the homestead should be impressed on the land only when it is operated by the man for whose benefit we enact this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. BONE. I think the Senator from Alabama would be able to frame an amendment that would make provision for a situation of this kind.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes. I did not prepare such an amendment. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] offered the amendment, but I was in full accord with the philosophy of it, that persons should be protected in their homestead ownership of these small farms.

Mr. BONE. Of course, there would be no object in attempting to impose the protection of a homestead on an owner who bought 50 of these homesteads and combines them, because such a man is not any longer a small farmer. He is an entrepreneur. He is a big operator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. While the Senator from Colorado is not in favor of the bill, I am willing to risk having him give his suggestions and his views on that subject.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama is stating my attitude on the bill, which has not been declared. I am anxious to have a good bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am asking the Senator to draw up the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall do so.

Mr. BONE. I think it a wise suggestion to ask the Senator from Colorado to draw up the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and I know he will do what he thinks is right. I am willing to trust him to draw it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Pursuing the inquiry of the Senator from Washington and referring to subdivision (4) of section 4, on page 22, limiting loans to—

A farm to be limited in area to the size of an average farm in the State where the land is located—

Has the Senator prepared, or have experts prepared, any estimates of the size of average farms in various States of the Union?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I have no table on that subject. I understand, however, that the Census Bureau has; and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], in presenting his amendment, stated that such data are available in the Census Bureau.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Would it be possible to provide such a table for the RECORD?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I shall endeavor to get it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Oklahoma has gone into the subject, and, knowing from experience that an average-size farm would be adequate for the purpose of this program, and that the information is available about what an average-size farm is in the States, it seems to me entirely satisfactory to provide that it shall be a farm of average size in the section in which the farm is located.

Mr. President, I think I have stated the substance of the changes which have been made in the bill.

I have three amendments merely correcting typographical mistakes and omissions which I shall send to the desk at this time. The amendments are purely corrective in nature, and do not substantially change the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 16, line 3, after the words "end of", it is proposed to strike out "3" and to insert in lieu thereof "2".

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not suppose the Senator from Alabama will undertake to ask to have this bill passed this afternoon, as practically all the Senators have gone. Almost all the Senators on the Republican side have gone. May I inquire whether it is the purpose to try to pass the bill this afternoon?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had hoped, in view of the situation in a number of committees and relating to conferences, that we might be able to dispose of this bill today and take a recess over the week-end. However, the discussion on the Holt case was continued somewhat longer than was anticipated. This bill was reached late in the day. I am satisfied, as is probably the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] also, that there is no possibility of concluding consideration of the bill today. Therefore it will be necessary to have a session tomorrow.

I will state to the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Louisiana that when the Senator from Alabama shall have concluded his remarks, or when he shall desire to conclude for the day, it will be my purpose to move an executive session, and then a recess.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that tomorrow, as soon as I can obtain recognition, I shall address the Senate on the redistribution of wealth and the President's message on the redistribution of wealth.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think we might proceed further with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will again report the first amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 16, in line 3, to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two", so as to make the clause read:

The terms of office of the Members first taking office after the date of enactment of this act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, one at the end of 2 years, one at the end of 4 years, and one at the end of 6 years, after the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I do not understand the reason for the change. Will the Senator from Alabama explain it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The original bill provided for a term of 2 years instead of 3 years. It is merely to correct a clerical error.

Mr. MCNARY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to give notice to the Senator from Alabama that tomorrow, or at an appropriate time, I shall offer an amendment, on page 16, line 16, to strike out the numerals "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000,000", this relating to the capital stock of the corporation.

I give notice also that I shall offer an amendment, on page 17, line 14, in the authorization for the issuance of bonds, to strike out the numerals "$1,000,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000,000." Upon reflection I may make it "$50,000,000." I shall not offer either amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, line 5, after the words "the principal of", insert the word "or", so as to make the sentence read:

In the event that the Corporation shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 17, line 4, after the words "sums to be", to insert the word "so", so the sentence would read:

Payments for such stock and other sums to be so transferred shall be made to the Corporation, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

ALASKAN COLONIZATION BY F. E. R. A.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention of the able Democratic leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I wish to make a brief statement and then submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I shall offer the resolution in behalf of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], and myself.

One of the interesting, or at least novel, experiments which has been undertaken by Administrator Hopkins of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration is the transplanting of certain farm families from continental United States to Alaska. About 2,000 persons thus far, according to my information, have been transported to Alaska with the contemplation that they will be established in this new governmental community which is to be set up at a town called Palmer in Alaska.

My colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], who is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of illness, is in receipt of the following telegram from Palmer, Alaska, signed by Patrick J. Hemmer and Mrs. I. M. Sandvik, who sign themselves as representatives of the colonists. The telegram reads as follows:

PALMER, ALASKA, June 15, 1935.

Senator JAMES COUZENS, OF MICHIGAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Six weeks passed, nothing done. No houses, wells, roads, inadequate machinery, tools, Government food undelivered, commissary prices exorbitant, educational facilities for season doubtful. Apparently men sent to pick political plums. Irwin and Washington officials O. K. Hands tied. Colonists cooperating. Request immediate investigation.

PATRICK J. HEMMER,
Mrs. I. M. SANDVIK,
Colonists' Representatives.

I know nothing about the reference in the telegram to "political plums", and I make no point of it.

I desire to supplement the telegram, however, by reading from a letter which was printed in the Detroit Times for June 18, written by one who signs herself as Mrs. Fred Rotz, who lived in Plymouth, Mich., until selected, with her husband and two children, to take part in the governmental colonist adventure. The letter from Mrs. Rotz, seemingly supporting the description in the telegram I have read, reveals the following alleged conditions:

1. Nearly every one of the 2,000 colonists is sick, some of the children suffering from measles and the adults infected with colds and severe attacks of bronchitis—yet there is but one physician and one nurse in the area.
2. The commissary is without medical supplies and a disastrous epidemic is feared by them.
3. Milk is so scarce it is limited to children less than 5 or 6 years of age.
4. There are many expectant mothers in the various camps who are without medical attention, and a request has been made that they be returned to Anchorage.
5. Instead of free groceries until they are self-sustaining, as the colonists say they were promised, everything purchased at the commissary is charged against the settlers and must be repaid in the future.
6. Prices at the commissary are not uniform, and some colonists believe they are being gouged.
7. Dissension already has resulted in removal of one executive.

Mr. President, it happens that most of these colonists came from Michigan and Wisconsin and Minnesota. Based upon the telegram which has been received at the office of my colleague [Mr. COUZENS], and based upon this letter from one of the colonists engaged in this adventure, it would appear to me essential, in the name of humanity, to inquire immediately into the facts involved. I make no pretense of supporting the information which I submit. I merely present to the Senate the information as it comes to us.

In connection with my remarks, I ask that the complete article from the Detroit Times be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Detroit (Mich.) Times of Tuesday, June 18, 1935]

MICHIGAN PIONEERS ILL IN ALASKA—PLYMOUTH WIFE DESCRIBES PRIVATIONS IN FAR NORTH—"PRAY FOR US", MRS. FRED ROTZ WRITES FROM PIONEERS' PRIMITIVE CITY IN ALASKA; TELLS OF DISSENSION IN CAMP

From the tented town of Palmer in an Alaskan wilderness came this plea from former Michigan residents:

"Pray for us, dear folks, at home. We need the mighty hand of God in this undertaking, and the united prayer of people everywhere."

The plea was made in a letter from Mrs. Fred Rotz, who lived at Plymouth, Mich., until selected with her husband and two children to take part in the Government's attempt to colonize Alaska.

REVEALS CONDITIONS

Conditions revealed by Mrs. Rotz:

(1) Nearly every one of the 2,000 colonists is sick, some of the children suffering from measles and the adults infected with colds and severe attacks of bronchitis—yet there is but one physician and one nurse in the area.

(2) The commissary is without medical supplies and a disastrous epidemic is feared by them.

(3) Milk is so scarce it is limited to children less than 5 or 6 years of age.

(4) There are many expectant mothers in the various camps who are without medical attention, and a request has been made that they be returned to Anchorage.

(5) Instead of free groceries until they are self-sustaining, as the colonists say they were promised, everything purchased at the commissary is charged against the settlers and must be repaid in the future.

(6) Prices at the commissary are not uniform, and some colonists believe they are being gouged.

(7) Dissension already has resulted in removal of one executive.

There are 295 men, women, and children from Michigan among the 2,000 persons who are uprooting trees and building log homes in the Alaskan valley. Most of them are from northern counties of the lower peninsula and from the counties above the Straits of Mackinac.

Measles broke out while the colonists were aboard ship, they reported. Physicians at Seward, Alaska, where the boat docked, feared scarlet fever and the settlers were quarantined while tests were made.

Measles continued to spread among the children after the modern pioneers reached Palmer, where they are living in tents while constructing their homes.

"Everyone has a terrible cold, due to the change in climate and the cold, damp weather," Mrs. Rotz said. "We have had a few sunny days, but nights and mornings are chilly.

"Measles breaking out in different camps; Mrs. Ring has six children down with the disease, and so are the two children of Mrs. Davis (apparently Mrs. Rotz refers to Mrs. Harold Davis, of Lansing).

"All through the night you can hear children and adults coughing. There are several bad cases of bronchitis.

ONLY ONE DOCTOR

"There is only one doctor and one nurse to work among 2,000 of us. The doctor says other medical people did not come because of the low pay. He came here originally to work in C. C. C. camps.

"There are no medical supplies in the commissary. Therefore, families are unable to help themselves."

Mrs. Rotz told of a feud within the colony between Michigan and Wisconsin settlers on one side and families from Minnesota on the other.

"Due to poor management the Minnesota people get supplies and materials sent here for Michigan and Wisconsin families," she continued. "We hear rumors of changes to be made in management.

"We cannot get lard. Instead, we are able to purchase only a vegetable substitute. Meat is kept in a very insanitary condition in one big box. All meat and fish are piled into this box with a piece of ice. There is no ventilation, and one kind of meat or fish taints another.

"The man in charge of food supplies, however, is being recalled, and we expect improved conditions."

Regarding the commissary, Mrs. Rotz said in her letter:

"Complaints and proof have been shown that where one person was charged $1.50 for a dishpan, others were given the same article for $1. The same applies to canned goods. So there is a row.

"There is a great kick about wages. Colonists receive 50 cents an hour, regardless of occupation. Workers like carpenters and machinists brought here to help out get $1.25 and $1.50 an hour.

"The colonists are not paid in cash, but must trade it out or apply it on our $3,200 debt for 40 acres and farm equipment. We had been told we would not start paying this debt for 3 years.

"Lack of funds for many of the necessary things of life works a hardship, particularly among the expectant mothers. The latter have asked permission to return to Anchorage, where there is a Government hospital. Their husbands will be required to work out the bill.

COMMUNISTS IN CAMP

"Several agitators go around making things look worse than they are. There are Communists even here. Most of the men in charge are working their heads off to straighten things out. The trouble has been mismanagement.

"Cows and horses and farm machinery are fine. We will receive these supplies when the homes are built.

"It's a bigger undertaking than originally thought and, due to some conditions, it may cost precious lives and heartbreaks. We believe the Government is trying to do everything possible, but there have been so many blunders.

"The buildings are better than we expected, but most of the work remains for the future, as there is no cleared land, as we had supposed. Also the families have not been helped with their groceries until they become self-sustaining. Everything is charged up.

"These are not my personal opinions. I have described conditions as they exist."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. KING. There appeared in last night's Washington Star, or the Star of the evening before—I am not sure which—an article nearly two columns in length, going into great detail concerning the sufferings and the wretched, horrible conditions prevailing in the Territory to which the Senator refers. I have the clipping in my office, and I regret that I have not it here to put in the RECORD.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for this added information. Apparently the situation is one which does require, in the name of simple humanity, some immediate attention.

I have no doubt that the administrative officers of the Government are somewhat familiar—they must be—with these conditions. It is not a pleasant contemplation. It seems to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] and to me that the least we can do in the Senate, on our own responsibility, is to ask for a report upon these conditions, in order to determine precisely what are the facts, our hope being that the request for the information will inspire an added effort to mend whatever difficulties exist, if they do exist.

It is in that spirit, Mr. President, and for that purpose, that I offer the following resolution in behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Minnesota, and myself:

Resolved, That Administrator Harry L. Hopkins, of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, is requested to report to the Senate respecting the Alaskan colonization enterprise, with particular reference to the following considerations:

1. Present status of the colonization, including numbers and description of persons transported to Alaska, and from what States;
2. Nature and extent of accommodations provided for them;
3. Any information available respecting alleged lack of facilities and supplies necessary to protection of health and life; and
4. Nature and extent of present and prospective expenditures in this connection.

I take the liberty of asking for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have no information touching the subject matter of the resolution other than that which has just been submitted and the statement I read in the press yesterday afternoon, which indicates a distressed condition upon the part of the people who have gone to Alaska. I think it appropriate that information regarding the matter should be supplied to the Senate.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I merely desire to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he has asked Director Hopkins for this information, or whether the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] or the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has done so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is my understanding that the office of my colleague [Mr. COUZENS] has sought information, and that the responses are rather vague.

Mr. BYRNES. The junior Senator from Michigan has not himself asked for the information?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not. I think it is a very appropriate thing for the Senate to ask for it officially.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not intend to object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan, on behalf of himself, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], offers a resolution which has been read and for which he asks present consideration. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 158) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Administrator Harry L. Hopkins, of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, is requested to report to the Senate respecting the Alaskan colonization enterprise, with particular reference to the following considerations:

1. Present status of the colonization, including numbers and descriptions of persons transported to Alaska, and from what States;
2. Nature and extent of accommodations provided for them;
3. Any information available respecting alleged lack of facilities and supplies necessary to protection of health and life; and
4. Nature and extent of present and prospective expenditures in this connection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Brig. Gen. Francis Guy Ash, Adjutant General's Department, West Virginia National Guard, to be brigadier general, Adjutant General's Department, National Guard of the United States.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of several officers for appointment, by transfer, in the Regular Army.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported favorably the nomination of Richmond B. Keech, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia for a term of 3 years from July 1, 1935 (reappointment).

Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

NOMINATIONS PASSED OVER—POSTMASTER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alice L. Woolman to be postmaster at Coweta, Okla.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair asks that the nomination be passed over for the day.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Monroe Johnson, of South Carolina, to be Assistant Secretary.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, that nomination was passed over yesterday upon the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has stated to me that he has no desire further to object to it, and that he was content to have the Senate act upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frank C. Walker, of New York, to be executive director.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frank H. Foy to be State director, Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles J. Hardy to be State director, New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Howard W. Oxley, of New York, to be director of camp education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Silas M. Ransopher, of New York, to be assistant director, camp education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John W. Cronin to be assistant surgeon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Saturday, June 22, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JUNE 21, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in Heaven, we thank Thee that there is no cry so faint, no cause so weak, and no man so humble as to be beyond divine sympathy. We rejoice that all distinctions are swept away. O welcome those who wish for Thee and live with those who long for Thee. Bless us with the more abundant life which is to heal wounds, lead others to hidden truth, open new realms of thought and new vistas of hope. Subdue in us any arrogant motives of self-interest and fits of temper—they disturb and even defeat our usefulness; they so often dull the finer instincts and crush the more compassionate feelings. Let the streams that flow from the fountains of heavenly grace flood our lives and fructify our minds. In our Savior's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1958) entitled "An act to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WALSH, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 100]

Andresen	Dickstein	Marshall	Shannon
Bacon	Dorsey	Mitchell, Ill.	Sisson
Bankhead	Doutrich	Murdock	Smith, Conn.
Brooks	Fish	Oliver	Smith, Va.
Brown, Mich.	Gassaway	Palmisano	Sweeney
Buckley, N. Y.	Gifford	Patman	Tobey
Bulwinkle	Hartley	Patton	Tolan
Cannon, Wis.	Hennings	Perkins	Underwood
Casey	Kopplemann	Pettengill	Whelchel

Cochran	Lea, Calif.	Richards	Wolcott
Connery	Lewis, Md.	Rogers, N. H.	Wood
Cooper, Ohio	McClellan	Russell
Dear	McGroarty	Seger

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seventy-one Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

SESSION OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent that that committee may sit today during the session of the House after half-past 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Rules Committee may have until midnight tonight to file several reports from that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SCHUYLER MERRITT

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and include therein a citation given to our colleague from Connecticut, SCHUYLER MERRITT, on receiving the degree of LL. D. from Yale University at its two hundred and thirty-fourth commencement at New Haven on June 19. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The citation referred to follows:

SCHUYLER MERRITT, LL. D.

Professor NETTLETON. Dean of the Connecticut Congressional delegation; hardy, and well-nigh perennial. Representative at Washington of the Fourth Connecticut District; even more firmly seated in the constant affection of a constituency which gladly transgresses party law and local limits. Born in New York City, but, after a single experimental year, withdrawing to Connecticut, he made Stamford his immediate home and Yale his future college, graduating in the class of '73, and taking his law degree from Columbia. For 50 years and more he has followed, as he has set, the highest standards of professional and public service, mating knowledge with integrity, and manhood with modesty. At home, administrator of civic charities, schools, and libraries; within the State, member of the convention which importantly revised the constitution, and chairman for 10 years of the Connecticut Board of Education; in Congress, valued member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee; ever an active agent of the common weal, fulfilled in the honors of half a century, but pressing forward with unclouded vision and unfaltering energy. It was written of an elder lawgiver who led the people out of the wilderness that, though he long outlived a century, "yet was not his eye dim, nor his natural force abated." May this be the law and the prophets. Quod bonum, felix, faustum, fortunatumque sit.

President ANGELL. Sturdy son of a sturdy stock, you have long and faithfully represented in the Halls of Congress the finest qualities of your native State. Shrewd wisdom, integrity, industry, unflinching honor, and the spirit of fair play—these have ever characterized your varied forms of public service and have justly won for you the admiration of friend and foe alike. Your alma mater, proud of your distinguished record, confers upon you her highest honor, the degree of doctor of laws, admitting you to all its rights and privileges.

CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks briefly in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I read in an afternoon newspaper that Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, in his unobtrusive way, is achieving great results in a new field of service with which his name has not heretofore been associated. It seems that this modest, unassuming pioneer of the air is pushing forward toward new frontiers, this time in the field of scientific research, which recalls to my mind a flood of memories of one of the most extraordinary characters of American history.

Eight years ago this month, on his return from his epochal flight to Paris, it was my duty and responsibility, as president of the National Press Club, to introduce him at the Washington Auditorium to what I believe was the largest audience ever assembled under one roof at the Nation's Capital. By unanimous consent of the House, I am going to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the speech I made on that occasion. It was as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, not for ages has the imagination of man been stirred as it was 3 weeks ago when Charles A. Lindbergh, fired by the intrepid spirit of the Western World, launched forth in his airplane alone, provisioned with four sandwiches and a bottle of water, a pioneer of the trackless seas. As America's shores receded in the distance he faced a vast wilderness of treacherous ocean.

As if roiled by the very boldness of this Columbus of the air—this winged Mercury, speeding like a thunderbolt of Jove—nature sent her tempestuous elements athwart his path, and while he battled with the storm and sleet millions upon millions of his fellow beings sent up prayers for his safety to the throne of God. The 33 hours and 30 minutes from New York to Paris was a period of tragic suspense, when the whole world poured forth in a myriad of mystic ways its admiration for the incomparable aviator and its love for the mother who had brought forth such a boy.

To him mountains of peril were as nothing. His faith was buoyant and his hopes were high. Courage was his woof and fiber, and it is not difficult to imagine that stern fate, surprised by this peremptory challenge of her inexorable decrees, lifted her beetled brows and was touched by the very sublimity of his heroism, for she gave him a sporting chance.

And when he reached the other shores he arose to another test of character as greatly as when he battled with time and the elements.

Amid all of the adulations of kings and parliaments he remained a modest, unassuming American, an honor to his home country, an ambassador of good will, doing more to foster amity between nations than could have been done by a thousand ministers of state.

"After all," he said in London, "two Britishers were the first to fly across the Atlantic." Again, when he learned that Chamberlin had started on the long flight, he remarked fervently, "I hope he makes it." Here he struck the major chord of his character in his desire to give to his comrades at home and across the seas a share of his imperishable glory. And when, in foreign lands, the ties of home began to press and strain against his heart and he confessed, in simple truth and sincerity, to being homesick, how America did yearn to take him to her bosom!

His name is now among the immortals. Around the firesides and in the vast, crowded halls of the future, wherever worth is recognized and genius is extolled, his achievement will be recalled with pride by countless generations yet unborn. Nothing finer could have been done; nothing grander could have been done; no greater epic could have been written into history, and tonight we thank Almighty God that in His infinite goodness and mercy He has permitted Charles A. Lindbergh to return to the arms of those who love him.

I now present Colonel Lindbergh.

Mr. Speaker, nothing has happened during the last 8 eventful years to mar the prophecy which I uttered on that occasion or to shake the Nation's faith in this remarkable young man. Although his life has been seared by one of the cruelest tragedies ever known in all the annals of crime, he goes serenely on trying to do good and seeking by a record of service to justify his existence in a world where there is always so much worth while to be done by those with righteous minds and willing hands.

Mr. Speaker, the news that Colonel Lindbergh is seeking through scientific research to ameliorate the condition of mankind once more stamps him as a man of purpose, as a many-sided genius who is described by his collaborator, Dr. Alexis Carrell, as possessing one of the "keenest and most intuitive and inventive minds." He does not need to do these things to win immortality, for immortality almost beyond comparison is his already. He does them because he loves his fellow men.

Mr. Speaker, since that other June, now rapidly fading into the mists of the past, when the youthful Charles A. Lindbergh returned amid riotous acclaim from Paris to a Nation that for the time had banished every other thought except the thought of throwing her arms around him, I have met him often, under diverse conditions and varying circumstances, and I have never ceased to admire him for his sincerity, for his determination, for his freedom from commercialism, for his altruism which has prompted him to devote his life's efforts to the common good and for the fact that under conditions that would have turned the heads of less well-poised mortals he has always remained a simple, true American, utterly free from affectation, courting no favors from the rich and powerful and standing on the principle that "a man's a man, for a' that", whether that principle be applied to those who dwell in hovels or in palaces. Every time I look at him I say to myself:

He has walked with kings, nor lost the common touch!

RAILROAD REORGANIZATION LEGISLATION

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill, H. R. 8587, the railroad reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

CLARENCE HERBERT PELTIER

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 669) for the relief of Clarence Herbert Peltier and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will withdraw that request. The Chair will not recognize Members to make speeches until after the Committee on Appropriations has concluded its business.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker, and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a joint resolution which I have introduced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will withhold that request until after the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I will withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8554) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1935, and June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8554, with Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "The Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933", approved May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 58), including the acquisition of necessary land, the clearing of such land, relocation of highways, and the construction or purchase of transmission lines and other facilities, and all other necessary works authorized by said act, and for printing and binding, law books, books of reference, newspapers, periodicals, purchase, maintenance, and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles, rents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and all necessary salaries and expenses connected with the organization, operation, and investigations of the Tennessee Valley Authority, $34,675,192: Provided, That this appropriation and all appropriations, allotments, and other funds made available heretofore to the Tennessee Valley Authority, including any unexpended balances remaining from the appropriation of $50,000,000 made to the Tennessee Valley Authority by the Fourth Deficiency Act, fiscal year 1933, the allocation of $25,000,000 made to the Tennessee Valley Authority under the Emergency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, and the receipts of the Tennessee Valley Authority from all sources, except as limited by section 26 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act approved May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 58), shall be covered into and accounted for as one fund to be known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority Fund" and shall remain available until June 30, 1936.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLEAN: On page 48, line 16, after the figures "1936", insert the following:

"All moneys of the Corporation of whatsoever nature hereafter received by or for the Corporation shall be immediately and without diminution deposited and covered into the Treasury of the United States, and such portion thereof as is authorized by the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended, or other law, to be used by said Corporation in carrying out the provisions of said act, as amended, shall be transferred to an appropriate appropriation account, withdrawable only on warrant as are other appropriated public moneys, and subject to authority specifically granted by the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, and as amended, all laws regulating the obligating or expenditure of other public moneys shall be applicable thereto: Provided, That the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, shall be applicable to purchases of supplies and equipment necessary for dam construction. Accounts of all transactions involving receipts or disbursements of the Corporation shall be duly rendered to the General Accounting Office at such times and in such substance and form as may be prescribed by the Comptroller General of the United States, and said accounts and such claims as may arise shall be settled and adjusted by the General Accounting Office under and pursuant to the provisions of title III of the Budget and Accounting Act approved June 10, 1921: Provided, That the expenses of such portion of the audit as the Comptroller General may authorize to be done in the field shall be paid from moneys advanced therefor by the Corporation, or from any appropriation or appropriations for the General Accounting Office, and appropriations so used shall be reimbursed promptly by the Corporation as billed by the Comptroller General. In such connection the Comptroller General and his representatives shall have free and open access to all papers, books, records, files, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other things, property, and places belonging to, under the control of, or used or employed by the Corporation, and shall be afforded full facilities for counting all cash and verifying transactions with the balances in depositaries. The officers of the Corporation to whom moneys may be advanced on accountable warrant shall each give a bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office according to law in such amount as shall be directed by the Comptroller General. Should there be any administrative delinquency in the rendering of the accounts as directed, or any unsatisfactory condition of the accounts, requisitions for funds shall be disapproved by the Comptroller General unless, for good cause shown, he shall elect to withhold such disapproval."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN] desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment really changes only to a limited extent the language of the committee amendment by limiting the manner in which the funds of the Tennessee Valley Authority shall be spent under the jurisdiction of the Comptroller General; and it makes the money applicable only to such disbursements as are made as a result of competitive bidding and not as a result of negotiated contracts, as has been the practice of the Tennessee Valley Authority. My amendment is purely a limitation on the activities of the agency to which this money is to be given.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear the gentleman.

Mr. TABER. This amendment is not only a limitation upon the funds carried in this bill which are in effect reappropriated, but it is also germane to the language of the bill covering the full appropriations that have been made for this purpose into one fund. It is, also, a direction as to how and in what manner the funds shall be accounted for.

By the rule under which we are proceeding in the consideration of this bill, anything germane to the language of the bill is made in order, and I believe the gentleman's amendment in its entirety is in order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. In answer to the argument of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], I maintain that the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey goes far beyond the effect claimed for it. The amendment changes existing law and is, therefore, legislation on an appropriation bill and entirely out of order, as pointed out by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken. The Chair bases this conclusion upon a ruling handed down by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tilson], while presiding over a Committee of the Whole. At that time and in a similar case it was held that although the amendment then offered was germane it contained additional legislation beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Chair believes that this amendment is germane but that it proposes additional legislation which is a subject matter ordinarily coming within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 48, line 16, strike out "$34,675,192" and insert in lieu thereof "$28,675,192"; page 48, line 16, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That none of the funds herein or elsewhere made available to the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Tennessee Valley fund shall be used for the construction of any new dam or power lines until further action by Congress."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is additional legislation on an appropriation bill and changes existing law, for it broadens the language of the pending bill by use of the words "or elsewhere."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TABER. I desire to be heard briefly, if the Chair please. The first portion of the amendment to the effect that none of the funds shall be available for the construction of any new dam or power lines until further action by Congress, is purely a limitation and strictly within the Holman rule.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the word "elsewhere" used in the amendment constitutes additional legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

In the opinion of the Chair, while the amendment is in the form of a limitation, yet the words "or elsewhere" contained in the amendment apply to other appropriations, and is therefore legislation; and for this reason the point of order is sustained.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 48, line 16, strike out "$34,675,192" and insert in lieu thereof "$28,675,192", and on page 48, line 16, strike out the period, insert a colon, and the following:

"Provided, That none of the funds herein made available to the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Tennessee Valley fund shall be used for the construction of any new dam or power lines until further action by Congress."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order before the gentleman argues this matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order because the use of the word "fund" implies funds not carried in the pending bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a further point of order against the amendment before the gentleman from New York begins his argument.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a further point of order against the amendment before any proceedings intervene.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the amendment constitutes a change in existing law unauthorized on an appropriation bill, in that the present law authorizes these funds to build dams.

Mr. RANKIN. And transmission lines.

Mr. BLANTON. And transmission lines. The gentleman's amendment seeks to change existing law, and this cannot be done in an appropriation bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I notice there is a mistake in the amendment I sent to the Clerk's desk. I intended to say, "On page 48, line 2, strike out '$34,000,000' and insert '$28,000,000.'"

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be so modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified as requested.

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, has the point of order been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is still pending.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is lodged also against the modified amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. RANKIN. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. TABER. It changes the line reference; I had the wrong line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment in its present form is a limitation applying solely to funds herein appropriated.

There is absolutely no question but what it is entirely a limitation upon the language that already appears in the bill as read. I can see no reason for sustaining the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair takes the position that the amendment is a limitation; therefore the point of order is overruled.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the Tennessee Valley Authority proposes with the funds that are herein made available to start work, as I understand it, upon two dams, known as "Chickamauga" and "Guntersville." These dams are quite expensive propositions. The total cost of these dams when completed, will be $27,000,000. If we start construction we will have to finish them.

Mr. Chairman, we have gone already ahead and started to build four dams, the Wheeler Dam, the Pickwick Dam, the Norris Dam, and the Wilson Dam. When those dams are completed some kind of a size-up may be then made as to whether there is any possible excuse for more dams. We are also in the process of constructing a lot of power lines. There is now an injunction suit pending to prevent the Tennessee Valley Authority engaging in the power business. Whether or not that will be sustained in the Supreme Court no one knows.

The only possible excuse for these dams is to control the flood situation at Chattanooga.

May I say that Engineering Document No. 328, page 188, shows the flood situation. It is expected that the Norris Dam will cut off a very large portion, if not all, of the flood damage that will accrue to Chattanooga. Personally, I believe it will. Why should we go ahead and appropriate money for more dams until we find out whether it will or not? If we go head and spend $17,000,000 for the Chickamauga Dam we have that much money invested. There is not navigation enough there to justify such an expenditure. It is not a power proposition, because the Pickwick Dam and the Wheeler Dam are not now equipped with a power house, with generators or with wheels to generate power. The Commission itself, even in the way it is being managed, recognizes that there is not demand enough to justify that sort of thing. Therefore we ought to stop the further construction of power lines or dams until we find out what the situation is going to be. We ought to stop this until we find out whether or not the Chattanooga situation is going to be entirely corrected, because that is the only excuse for the Chickamauga Dam or any of the others.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. We ought to at least make the Tennessee Valley Authority submit a report or give an estimate of what these things are going to cost before they are permitted to go ahead and start construction?

Mr. TABER. Frankly, may I say I think we have a statement from them as to what these dams will cost; but we ought to have a picture of this whole situation, and whether or not it can be made to operate successfully.

According to their own statement, which appears in the RECORD, it will cost at least $192,000,000 to build the dams which they want to build, and in 1941 the only revenue they expect to receive will be about $5,000,000, which would not more than half pay the depreciation charges, not alone the interest on the money invested. We are already in this thing. We have a lot of power available out of the Norris and Wilson Dams to sell. Now, let us find out what the constitutional situation is with reference to the right of the Government to go ahead and sell power. Let us find out what the flood-control situation is going to be before we go ahead and fool away a lot more money.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's contention against building these dams is that we do not know the situation in Chattanooga as to the floods and consequently we ought to wait. If you want a picture of the flood situation in Chattanooga during different floods, there it is [displaying a large picture]. Practically all the city was covered with water in 1917. The gentleman from New York knows that the proof produced shows that the building of the Norris Dam will lower the flood stage 6 feet, and that the Chickamauga Dam will lower it 3½ feet. We do not have to wait until my city is swept from the banks of the Tennessee River to have the proper proof of need for protection, and no one on the committee knows the situation better than the gentleman from New York. Here is a picture of flood stage there of 47 feet and 35 feet. You can see the serious troubles we may have by this blue print. We do not have to wait.

Mr. Chairman, this is the usual old cry of the Republican Party in trying to defeat the construction of these dams on the Tennessee River. There is not a dam included in this appropriation which was not approved by the Congress in 1932. I regret the fact that they on the other side are trying to make this a party measure. You know they tried to junk the Wilson Dam because it was named after that great President of the World War, Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

We passed bills some two or three times disposing of Muscle Shoals, and the Cove Creek Dam, and it was vetoed by Hoover and by Coolidge. The reason we have authority to construct these dams now is because Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected President.

Mr. Chairman, if the Membership votes to amend this appropriation, if they interfere with it in any way, it will be a strike at the administration. I appeal to the Democrats to uphold the Appropriations Committee in passing this appropriation as it is. It has already been cut down from the Budget estimate of $60,000,000 to $34,000,000. It provides for the commencement of these two dams, Guntersville and Chickamauga, which are necessary for the navigation of the Tennessee River. It is necessary to control the flood situation existing in my city, and may I say that the average damage to that city, as estimated over a period of years, is $687,000 per year. Then they tell me to wait to see whether or not we need this dam. I say again that the gentleman from New York knows the situation, because the proof was offered before his committee, and he is thoroughly familiar with the situation. I ask the Democrats to stand by the administration and to stand by these dams that in 1932 were endorsed by the Congress for the improvement of navigation in the Tennessee River, for flood control, and to create power.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Eliminating the problem of flood control, if the Tennessee River is to be made navigable, these dams are necessary?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Absolutely necessary. These dams will make the Tennessee River available for navigation for 71 miles above Chattanooga. There is nothing, in my opinion, that has come before this House with more merit than this item in the pending appropriation bill.

I appeal to you not to let them cut the amount one cent or put one modification upon it. It aids the South, but it aids the entire United States as well. [Applause and cries of "Vote."]

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, we have opposition to this section of the proposed measure from two sources. The first is political in its nature; certain members of the Republican Party oppose it because the Tennessee Valley Authority is the brain child of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the greatest leader of modern times. The other source of opposition is from the electric utility and coal companies. If we brush aside the curtain of suspicion and misrepresentation we see the directing hand of the utility companies of this country. They read the handwriting on the wall. There has been a great deal of misleading information brought to this House, as well as a distortion of the facts with reference to the aims and purposes of the T. V. A. We have been told it is not necessary to build the Guntersville or the Chickamauga Dams at this time. They overlook the fact that these two dams are primarily for the purpose of developing navigation and to provide flood control. The Army engineers estimate that there is an annual loss from floods of $1,784,000 each year on the Tennessee River alone. If we consider the loss on the tributaries, the amount will be increased. A total acreage of 666,154 is inundated each year.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES. Gladly.

Mr. RANKIN. This is also a most insidious move to try to paralyze the Tennessee Valley Authority by preventing the building of power lines to carry on its work.

Mr. STARNES. Absolutely.

With reference to the question of navigation, the Pickwick Dam, the Wheeler Dam, and the Wilson Dam will bring 9 feet of navigable water to Guntersville, Ala. Guntersville is in the heart of the Tennessee River Valley. Chattanooga and Knoxville and the great industrial area lying back of these cities are approximately 120 and 250 miles to the northeast. It is absolutely essential that the Guntersville Dam be built next in order to open navigation to a 7-foot stage to the city of Chattanooga, Tenn. This dam will also assist in flood control and provisions can be made for developing power when needed.

These two dams are essential to this program, and I hope the Committee will vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. As a matter of fact, there can be no economic development of this entire project without these two dams.

Mr. STARNES. Absolutely not. This is the heart of the program.

We must not overlook the fact that in addition to the development of navigation the T. V. A. program embraces the prevention of soil erosion, reforestation, the development of cheaper power, the manufacture of cheaper fertilizer, and provisions for the national defense. This program is the most far-reaching plan in the history of this Nation for the betterment of the social and economic condition of the people of this Nation. It is absolutely essential that the T. V. A. have an opportunity to develop the program unhampered by unnecessary litigation, unnecessary political sniping, and legislation which will restrict its operations to a point where the directors cannot function. I hope the Committee will vote down the amendment. [Applause.]

I have unbounded confidence in the ability, honor, and integrity of the directors of the T. V. A. They are men who have a passion for service. Each is an outstanding leader in his particular activity. The plans and aims of the Authority are in line with the legislative will of the Congress as expressed in the original T. V. A. Act.

Members of Congress realize that this is not a local nor a sectional program. The Tennessee Valley covers an area of approximately 42,000 square miles and has a population of two and a quarter million. The area touches upon seven southeastern States. There is a wide variety of natural resources in this region. The T. V. A. proposes to utilize these resources to better the social and economic condition of the people in this region and to demonstrate to the people of the Nation that similar programs can be successful anywhere in our country.

Although this region has a fine native white-stock population and an infinite variety of natural resources and unlimited power possibilities, private utilities and private industry, of which the opposition so glibly prate, have failed to develop this section and by obstructionist tactics would prevent the proper development of this great region by the T. V. A.

The program of the T. V. A. is essentially a program of utilization and conservation. It is time for the people of this country to realize that in order to continue the march of progress we must utilize our vast natural resources and conserve them for future generations. In this manner, and in this manner only, can we properly fulfill our destiny. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the Military Affairs Committee of the House has been holding hearings on this T. V. A. proposition for over 4 months.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Have they not really been holding an inquisition on the T. V. A.?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I think they have.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I think so, too.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I may say to the Committee that the early edition of the hearings, which included the testimony given to the House committee during the months of February and March, has been published. The more important and more illuminating hearings by the House Military Affairs Committee were held on this subject during the months of April and May. In accordance with the usual courtesy of a congressional committee, a transcript of these hearings was sent to Messrs. Morgan and Lilienthal over 2 weeks ago for their correction. The bill in its entire form is coming before the House next week, and I believe I am correct when I state that your Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee wired Mr. Lilienthal and Mr. Morgan 2 days ago requesting a return of this transcript so that these hearings may be printed and available to Members when the House bill is considered. I know, as a matter of fact, that at least up to an hour ago the transcript of the hearings had not been received in the Military Affairs Committee, and we had not had even the courtesy of a reply to the request by wire. I here and now call upon Mr. Morgan and Mr. Lilienthal to return the transcript of these hearings by next Monday morning so they may be published by the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] that Dr. Morgan will be here next week with this transcript. He is not holding it out. There was so much information called for in the examination of the directors of the T. V. A. that it is taking some time to get it up.

The object of this amendment is to harass the T. V. A. It is an insidious movement on the part of the Power Trust, by indirection, through their friends in Congress, to try to hamper the work of the Tennessee Valley Authority in order that they may not be able to do the very things we provided in the law of 1933. It is an attempt to prevent their building the transmission lines necessary to keep from being bottled up by the Power Trust and to destroy the great work the T. V. A. is now doing.

I have seen what has been going on before this Committee on Military Affairs, and I have seen the outrageous inquisition to which Dr. Morgan has been subjected at the hands of those men who are more in sympathy with the Power Trust than they are with the American people.

I want to take this occasion to say that one of the great men of this Republic, one of the great men of this day, is Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, of the Tennessee Valley Authority. I believe he is the greatest constructing engineer on this continent.

If Dr. Morgan had been financially minded, he might have become a multimillionaire. He might have gone to England and become a resident there—as another great engineer did. He might have gone to Australia and got rich exploiting the people of Australia. He might have gone to China and transported Chinese coolies to South Africa to die under the burning rays of an African sun and made a fortune in that way, regardless of the condemnation of the British courts.

He might have become food administrator and come back here heralded as a great humanitarian as well as a great engineer.

He might have become a Republican candidate for President, after he decided which party he belonged to, and been heralded as a great statesman, a high-powered intellect, a superman, and organizing genius, who could put 2 cars in every garage and 2 chickens in every pot. [Laughter and applause.]

After the failure of his administration, he might have been found groveling among the grass roots of the drought-stricken area, seeking for an issue or searching for an alibi. [Applause.]

But Dr. Morgan chose to devote his life to building up America.

If you want to know whether he has been successful, go to the people along the Miami River in Ohio, where formerly thousands of men, women, and children were drowned, and see what this great man has done there in protecting those people from such disasters in the future.

I resent these insinuations against Dr. Morgan by Members of Congress who are more in sympathy with the Power Trust than they are with the American people. I never met a more earnest, firm, patriotic man in my life than Dr. Morgan. He will bring the records here, and when you bring this bill out on the floor of the House the Congress of the United States will be here to take care of it. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in 5 minutes.

Mr. McLEAN. O Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. No unanimous-consent request is pending. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statements that have been made, I think I am entitled to be heard for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that three Members have spoken against the amendment and two for it, I shall change my motion and move to close debate in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, that all debate upon this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] I am impelled to take a position on the floor of the House, though I do so most reluctantly, because of the request of my good friend and colleague from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS], who is personally interested in one of these dams. For months the House Committee on Military Affairs, which is the legislative committee in the House which has charge of the Tennessee Valley Authority legislation, has been holding hearings, and in those hearings we have had the testimony of all of the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority. We have had the testimony of scores of other witnesses in opposition to the proposed amendment to the Tennessee Valley Act. Throughout that whole hearing—and I state this fearless of contradiction—there has been a tendency and disposition on the part of the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority to ignore the Congress of the United States and do as they please in the Tennessee Valley. Under the provisions of the original basic act by which the Tennessee Valley Authority was created it was provided that they should report to Congress their conduct, their actions, and their doings in that valley and give a constructive, detailed program of what they were spending and how they proposed to spend it. That they steadfastly refuse to do, and this amendment, if put into this bill, will require them to come to us for money.

So far as the Power Trust is concerned, I made my living, until I came to Congress to starve, largely off the power companies as a prosecutor of litigation against them. I have no interest in them, but I am interested in the great coal industry in this country, that employs thousands of men in my district and hundreds of thousands of others in the States of Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, and all throughout this country.

We were literally told by Dr. Morgan that the coal industry is doomed in this country; that electricity proposes to take its place; and the situation is this, that you are building a bureau in Tennessee with 2,500 while-collar employees riding around in cars at 7 cents a mile extra over regular salary and per diem; $140,000 was paid out last year, over and above their daily and monthly wages, for car hire. You are building a bureau with 2,500 white-collar employees in Knoxville, Tenn., bigger than half the departments in Washington, and you propose to turn loose three bureaucrats, dreamers, who believe in the socialistic doctrines of Edward Bellamy, the first great socialist in America, as stated by Dr. Morgan last week in a speech in Knoxville. He said that he visualized a great utopian state, and that it was the T. V. A. plans to establish in the southeastern part of the United States such a state as Edward Bellamy wrote about 50 years ago, and that means communism in its vilest form.

All this amendment proposes to do is to tell them to come to Congress when they want to do something and tell us what it is. Instead of that, they propose to build a string of dams, and they say there ought to be 50 or 60 in the Tennessee Valley that will cost over a billion dollars. All this amendment does is to tell them to work on through the next 2 years on the Norris Dam, which will take a year, when it is done, to fill it up with water; on the Wheeler Dam, that is a year and a half behind; and on the other dam they have started, in which they have just begun their foundation, the Pickwick Dam, before commencing other dams. That is all it means. They are going around the Military Affairs Committee and going into the Appropriations Committee, demanding multiplied millions, and after awhile they will be down at the White House to get another $100,000,000 out of the $4,800,000,000 that we handed over to the President to do with as he pleases; and after a while you will have a monster in Tennessee and Alabama that will swallow every right of every one of the States in the South. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I was elected to Congress to take part in its deliberations. I was assigned to a committee of this House, charged with a certain duty, and in the exercise of that duty there developed certain conditions which I considered worthy of attention and which should have investigation. Pursuant to my obligation as a Member of Congress and as a member of that committee, I proceeded to inquire into matters which I believed the country was entitled to know about. I have no feeling of disrespect for Dr. Arthur E. Morgan. On the contrary, I am willing to agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] that he is a most distinguished and capable man, but there must be some merit in the opposition which arose against this proposition to have excited so much interest. There is not a man in the Congress who knows the program of the Tennessee Valley Authority. There is no document to which we can refer to ascertain what the Tennessee Valley Authority intends to do. If the Tennessee Valley Authority had, in the exercise of reasonable judgment, made a study of the situation and reported it to Congress, we could have investigated it and looked into it and perhaps have determined upon it as a plan of comprehensive development, and we would know what the ultimate was going to be and how much is going to be spent each year, in an orderly way, just as we do in other matters.

The Tennessee Valley Authority does not intend to let Congress know how far it expects to go. They could not now because they do not know themselves. There must be some merit in this opposition because their budget request was for $56,000,000. Later when the opposition started and they looked into the matter they returned to Congress and they said, "We can get along with $40,000,000." The Committee on Appropriations, after mature deliberation and consideration, has determined that they can get along with $34,878,000.

What I want is a square deal for American business men, and they are not getting it now in the Tennessee Valley. When a constituent of mine says "I was the lowest bidder for concrete mixers or for equipment that they are using in the Tennessee Valley, and my equipment was all that was required of it, it complied with the specifications, but I did not get the contract; I stayed in Knoxville for 2 weeks waiting to be consulted by representatives of the Tennessee Valley Authority, only to find out on the street that the contract had been awarded to the highest bidder", it is time to look into these things. These men defy the statutes of the United States when it comes to negotiating contracts and granting awards to the highest bidders on contracts. That is an illustration of the kind of thing that we tried to impress upon Dr. Morgan before the committee as being wrong. Those are the things that came to me through correspondence and through the newspapers. I asked Dr. Morgan if they were correct, and we found out that they were. Am I not justified, under those circumstances, in inquiring into them, and on that account and because of that should I be held up to ridicule by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN] yesterday afternoon, prompted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] who sent for the book, and when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] this afternoon inferred that I am a representative of the Power Trust? The people of Union County, N. J., know me. I have no fears for the slurs that are thrown at me in this exercise of my public duty.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. How could the gentleman know I was talking about him when I said "friends of the Power Trust"?

Mr. McLEAN. I know the gentleman's inference. Everybody in the House knew it. But I say to you that though my activities perhaps may have appeared as though I was alined with the power interests, I have no interest in any Power Trusts. I believe there are things going on in the Tennessee Valley that the American people ought to know about. I say there ought not be another dollar appropriated for this organization until they put their house in order. They have $10,000,000 to use to finish the work, and they can go ahead and finish their work, and they will have plenty of money to put their house in order and get this thing on an orderly basis. Then they can send a report to Congress and come here and tell us how much it is going to cost and what we are going to ultimately get, and then we will be able to deliberate without all this excitement. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCLEAN] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were ayes 59 and noes 123.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICH: Page 48, line 2, after the word "Authority", strike out "$34,675,192" and insert "2 cents."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is merely dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair could not pass on a matter of that kind at this point.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RICH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph relative to the Tennessee Valley Authority and all amendments thereto be closed in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I proposed this amendment because I am opposed to the Government in business. I do not believe the Government of the United States should try to pattern after Russia. The administration of Mr. Roosevelt recognized Russia about a year ago, and we are trying to pattern after that nation as much as any nation in the world. It seems to me it is about time the American people woke up and found out that their rights are being taken away from them. It is about time that the American people realized that this administration is putting the Government into business with such rapidity that it will not be long until we will be a socialized nation; that we will be a nation patterned after Russia.

We have heard this called an administration measure, and we have seen it backed by the party. I want to say that the party that is recommending the Government to be in all lines of business, competing with the citizens of its own country, socializing it, robbing it of its taxpayers, robbing the citizens of a right the Constitution gave to them, will soon find out that the day will come in America, and it is not far away, when the people will rise up and put down any party that proposes Russianizing the United States, and it is right that it should.

I just picked out of the newspaper this morning a most interesting statement:

COURT REFUSES TO LET ESTATES BUY UNITED STATES BONDS—PRORATE JUDGE IN ILLINOIS HOLDS RATE IS TOO LOW, NATIONAL DEBT TOO HIGH

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., June 20.—Probate Judge Benjamin S. DeBoice, of Sangamon County, today refused authority to the First State Trust & Savings Bank, as conservator in seven estates, to invest the estate funds in United States Government securities.

The court, in a thousand-word opinion, held that "during this period of business uncertainty and lowering prices the investing public has turned to Government obligations as a cyclone cellar in which to place investments."

Predicting that "we are upon the eve of a period of inflation," Judge Boice held that the trend of prices upon most tangible goods was upward and that real estate prices showed a definite gain. "Today bank reserves are the largest in history and every bank and insurance company in the country is full to overflowing with cash, awaiting the opportunity for investment.

This is worth while for the members of the Democratic Party to hear. The court refused to permit the estate to buy Government bonds because we are spending the taxpayers' money recklessly and are not trying to do anything to increase the revenues or repaying the expenditures. Quite true, the other day the President sent down a message on the subject of increased taxation, but it was the biggest camouflage ever put over on the American people. Why did he not make recommendation for immediate increases of taxes to balance his Budget as he promised the people when he was elected. He is only fooling the people, and you know what they say about that—you can fool all the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time. And Mr. Roosevelt will be no exception to that.

Read the speech of Lew Douglas, former Director of the Budget for Mr. Roosevelt, at the commencement at Amherst a few days ago, and you will know that the administration fooled him, and he quit Mr. Roosevelt. I think Lew Douglas would be great presidential timber for the Democratic Party. He would fulfill his promises and those of the Democratic Party.

When the situation gets to the point where a judge refuses to permit estates to buy bonds of the Federal Government as an investment for trust funds, the position is very precarious indeed. [Applause.] I say that if this administration recognizes that inheritance taxes should be increased, that the taxes on those who make great incomes should be increased, you ought to do it and not talk about it, for you cannot increase the national debt any more than it is, and the greatest in history, without endangering our very safety as a Nation. Mr. Roosevelt is the greatest spender of all time, and probably the greatest promiser, but he does not fulfill his promises. We should not appropriate but two cents for T. V. A.—it is unconstitutional—it should die and die now. I hope the amendment does pass.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think we all agree that there are no serious amendments to be offered for consideration during the further reading of the bill; and I ask, therefore, unanimous consent that the bill may be considered as having been read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, for the Congress, in the consideration of an appropriation bill dealing with large sums of money, to establish the precedent of considering the bill as read would be very bad. The Members should know all there is in the bill. The bill can be read rapidly, and it can be passed in the regular order. I think every dollar appropriated out of the Treasury should be appropriated in a regular, systematic, and considered way.

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Hospital and domiciliary facilities: For hospital and domiciliary facilities, $20,000,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That this amount is authorized to be used by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, with the approval of the President, for extending any of the facilities under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration or for any of the purposes set forth in sections 1 and 2 of the act approved March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1550): Provided further, That not to exceed 3 percent of this amount shall be available for the employment in the District of Columbia and in the field of necessary technical and clerical assistants at the customary rates of compensation exclusively to aid in the preparation of the plans and specifications for the projects authorized herein and for the supervision of the execution thereof, and for traveling expenses, rentals in the District of Columbia, field-office equipment, and supplies in connection therewith.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a couple of questions with reference to the Veterans' Administration. Is a considerable part of the $20,000,000 to be used for the care of mental cases?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There are over 11,000 ailing veterans without hospitalization, which number includes 7,000 mental cases.

Mr. BIERMANN. Does the chairman know off-hand how the bill affects the situation in Iowa?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; I know only that substantial provision has been made for the Knoxville Hospital. The hospital facilities are to be increased in strategic parts of the country in such way as to accommodate the greatest number of veterans around and near their homes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the committee is appropriating a large part of this money for the care of mental cases. There has been a serious shortage of facilities for the care of veterans afflicted with mental disabilities in Government hospitals. This has resulted in the assignment of some of them to State insane hospitals, where sometimes the care has not been satisfactory. My opinion has been, and continues to be, that Government hospitals for veterans should be pretty well confined to mental cases, tubercular cases, and a few other types that require special hospital equipment.

I believe that the majority of veterans' cases could be handled better and with less expense to the Government in the local hospitals. I am sure that it does not contribute to a veteran's comfort nor to his recovery to have him taken away from his home, his family, and his friends to be cared for by total strangers and to encounter the depressing loneliness of a strange city. There are thousands of empty beds in the non-Government hospitals of the country, which, it seems to me, could well be occupied by veterans. In his home-town hospital the veteran would be cared for by a doctor who knows him, waited on by nurses who know him, and visited by his family and his friends. Such surroundings, I am sure, would be much more favorable to the veteran's comfort and recovery than the strange surroundings of a far-away Government hospital.

The local hospitals usually are supported by the donations of public-spirited individuals or by the benevolence of churches. These hospitals need the business. The use of them would assist in their financial support. It surely would be more satisfactory to the veterans, and obviously less expensive to the Government.

I earnestly hope that the proper committee will give serious consideration to a change in our veterans' hospitalization system to the end that: (1) Government hospitals shall be used almost, if not quite, exclusively for mental, tubercular, and other cases requiring special hospital equipment, and that (2) the veteran shall be permitted to receive his treatment at Government expense in his local hospital in all cases where that hospital is properly equipped to care for him.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY

Armor, armament, and ammunition: For an additional amount toward the armor, armament, and ammunition for vessels heretofore authorized, and so forth, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Navy Department for the fiscal year 1935, $6,110,000, to remain available until expended.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct a question or two to the chairman of the committee. Will the chairman please inform the Committee how much money has already been appropriated to the Navy Department for other naval purposes?

Mr. BUCHANAN. For the next fiscal year?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. $458,684,379 is the amount in the pending Naval Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1936.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And, with the appropriations carried in this deficiency bill, what will the total amount to?

Mr. BUCHANAN. $20,000,000 more, or $478,684,379.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I thank the gentleman.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER CORPS

Construction of buildings, utilities, and appurtenances at military posts: For construction, remodeling, recondition, and installation at military posts of buildings and appurtenances thereto, including interior facilities, necessary services, roads, connections to water, sewer, gas, and electric mains, and similar improvements with reference to sections 1136 and 3734, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1339; title 40, sec. 267), including also the engagement by contract or otherwise without regard to section 3709, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), and without regard to the restrictions of existing law governing the employment or compensation of employees of the United States, and at such rates of compensation as the Secretary of War may determine of the services of architects or firms or corporations thereof and other technical and professional personnel as may be necessary, and including also general overhead expenses of transportation, engineering, supplies, inspection and supervision, travel connected therewith, and such services as may be necessary in the office of the Quartermaster General, to remain available until expended, $9,850,000 as follows: Toward construction at the United States Military Academy, $5,324,250; toward construction of an airdrome in Hawaii, $4,525,750.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask similar questions with reference to the War Department.

Will the chairman please tell us how much has been appropriated heretofore for the War Department for the next fiscal year?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The War Department Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1936 carries $341,348,204 for military activities and $60,649,966 for nonmilitary activities, making a total of $401,998,170.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. This carries an additional appropriation of approximately $20,000,000?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think the gentleman is talking about rivers and harbors and military posts. This deficiency bill carries $10,000,000 for rivers and harbors and $9,850,000 for military activities. These sums are additional to the amounts I have just stated.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

May I direct a question to the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee? On page 58 the sum of $5,324,250 is appropriated for construction at the United States Military Academy. Can the chairman tell us whether it is proposed that the Government do this work itself or let it by contract?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Under the language it may be done either way. In some instances a good deal of it may be done by force account. They may have it done either by force account or by contract.

Mr. KENNEY. Has the gentleman considered providing for the prevailing rate of wage in the contracts let to private contractors?

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is done under the prevailing rates of wage.

Mr. KENNEY. The chairman probably knows that Congress last term passed a bill appropriating $3,300,000,000 for Public Works. Some of that money was by Executive order given over to the Navy Department to be used in building navy vessels—cruisers and, I believe, one or more destroyers. Contracts for their building were let to a shipbuilding company in my State, but there being no provision in the contracts for payment of the prevailing wage scale, a serious strike resulted involving 3,700 workmen, who complained of inordinately low wages, excessive working hours, and unfair working conditions. The strike began May 13 last and still persists. I was wondering whether or not the gentleman has considered the feature of guaranteeing the prevailing rate of wages in all private contracts?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The item the gentleman refers to was under the P. W. A., and when they made those allotments from the $3,300,000,000 the P. W. A. rate of wage was required to be used in the allotment thus made. That has no application to this appropriation, and no other emergency activity has any relation to it. This is under the regular program of the Government as practiced from year to year.

Mr. KENNEY. May I say to the gentleman that the P. W. A. turned P. W. A. moneys or funds over to the Navy Department? The Navy Department handled the contracts for the building of the ships, and in the contracts made by the Navy Department no provision was made for paying labor prevailing-rate wages.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly; but this is an appropriation made by the Congress, and it is subject to the prevailing rate of wage.

Mr. KENNEY. The gentleman is satisfied as to that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 43, line 14, for the purpose of offering an amendment to correct a misprint.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 43, line 14, strike out "1934" and insert in lieu thereof "1914."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8554) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1935, and June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, under the resolution (H. Res. 266) he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments agreed to in Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTROL OF FLOODS ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND ITS TRIBUTARIES

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplemental report on the bill (H. R. 7349) to amend the act entitled "An act for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes", approved May 15, 1928, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follow:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

On amendment no. 1: Increases from $4,200 to $9,000, as proposed by the Senate, the amount that may be expended upon allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, to civilian employees serving in foreign countries.

On amendments nos. 2, 3, and 4, relating to the appropriation "Miscellaneous expenses": Appropriates $1,062,700, instead of $1,055,700, as proposed by the House, and $1,071,060, as proposed by the Senate, such increase of $7,000 being intended to make additional amounts available for communication expenses, postage, and clerk hire, all incident to the reopening of the Naval Training Station, Great Lakes.

On amendments nos. 5, 6, and 7, relating to the Naval Research Laboratory: Appropriates $310,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $210,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments nos. 8 to 13, both inclusive, relating to the appropriation "Training, education, and welfare, Navy": Appropriates $115,559, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $103,059, as proposed by the House, for the Naval Training Station, Newport, R. I.; limits expenditures upon post-graduate instruction of prospective or potential Staff Corps officers who have not been commissioned in the line of the Navy more than 3 years, instead of 2 years, as proposed by the House, and 5 years, as proposed by the Senate; appropriates $58,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $55,000, as proposed by the House, for libraries incident to the reopening of the Naval Training Station, Great Lakes; and appropriates $282,200, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $279,200, as proposed by the House, for welfare and recreation, also incident to the reopening of the Naval Training Station, Great Lakes.

On amendment no. 14: Corrects the text.

On amendments nos. 15, 16, and 17, relating to the Naval Reserve: Limits to 19, as proposed by the Senate, instead of 20, as proposed by the House, the number of Reserve officers (Navy and Marine Corps) above the grade of senior lieutenant of the Navy who may draw the pay and allowances of their grade while in the performance of extended active duty.

On amendment no. 19: Limits the amount that may be expended for pay of masters and instructors in swordsmanship and physical training at the Naval Academy to $22,800, as proposed by the House, instead of $25,100, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments nos. 20 and 21, relating to the appropriation "Engineering": Appropriates $19,662,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $19,550,000, as proposed by the House, the increase of $112,000 being intended to cover the "engineering" portion of the expense of building a new ferry for use at Newport, R. I.; reappropriates $500,000 to be applied to the purchase of machine tools, as proposed by the Senate, and increases the limitation of $1,662,000 proposed by the House upon expenditures for pay of classified employees to $1,667,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments nos. 22 and 23, relating to the appropriation "Construction and repair of vessels": Appropriates $18,288,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $18,050,000, as proposed by the House, the increase of $238,000 being intended to cover all other than the "engineering" expenses of building a new ferry for use at Newport, R. I.; reappropriates $500,000, to be applied to the purchase of machine tools, as proposed by the Senate, and increases the limitation of $1,800,000 proposed by the House upon expenditures for pay of classified employees to $1,805,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 24: Reappropriates $500,000 under the Bureau of Ordnance, to be applied to the purchase of machine tools, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments nos. 25, 26, 27, and 29, relating to the appropriation "Pay, subsistence, and transportation, Navy": Corrects the text and fixes the amount allocated for pay of enlisted men, active list, at $73,872,972, as proposed by the House, instead of $74,621,779, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments nos. 30 and 31, relating to the appropriation "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts": Appropriates $8,350,540, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $8,300,000, as proposed by the House, the increase of $50,540 being incident to reopening the naval training station, Great Lakes, and makes a minor textual change.

On amendment no. 32: Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the House provision increasing the capital of the naval supply account fund by $7,500,000 by the reappropriation of unobligated balances of certain prior year appropriations for the purpose of enabling the Navy Department to acquire a partial reserve of strategic minerals of domestic production.

On amendment no. 33: Appropriates $2,179,400 for the Medical Department, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $2,100,000, as proposed by the House, the increase of $79,400 being incident to reopening the naval training station, Great Lakes.

On amendments nos. 34 to 37, both inclusive, relating to the appropriation "Aviation, Navy": Allocates $11,020,450 to the maintenance and operation subhead, instead of $10,755,150, as proposed by the House, and $11,285,750, as proposed by the Senate; reduces the allocation of $26,770,000 proposed by the House to the aircraft procurement subdivision by $54,340, as proposed by the Senate, the amount of such reduction being added elsewhere for pay of employees, Bureau of Aeronautics; and fixes the amount of contract authorization at $6,590,000, instead of $5,000,000, as proposed by the House, and $8,180,000, as proposed by the Senate, the increase agreed upon over the amount proposed by the House being for the procurement of spare parts for new airplanes.

On amendments nos. 38, 39, and 40, relating to the Marine Corps Reserve: Appropriates $224,238, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $120,860, as proposed by the House, the entire increase being for clothing, and makes provision for clothing for aviation cadets, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 41: Makes a reappropriation of $6,000,000, instead of $11,690,000, as proposed by the Senate, of unobligated balances of certain prior year appropriations, in augmentation of the direct appropriation of $88,310,000 proposed by the House under the head of "Increase of the Navy, construction and machinery", thus making the total available on account of the 24 ships to be laid down in the fiscal year 1936, $20,690,000, instead of $29,380,000, as proposed in the Budget, and $26,380,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 43: Excepts the 15,000-ton aircraft carrier, the construction of which is to be initiated during the fiscal year 1936, from the requirement respecting a division of new ship construction work between Government and private yards, in conformity with the provisions of the Treaty Navy Authorization Act, approved March 27, 1934, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments nos. 45 and 46: Appropriates $337,000 for salaries, Bureau of Aeronautics, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $282,660, as proposed by the House.

On amendment no. 47: Appropriates $20,000 for printing historical naval documents, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $15,000, as proposed by the House.

Disagreements

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the following amendments of the Senate:

On no 18: Relating to Naval and Marine Corps Reserve officers on permanent active duty.

On no. 28: Relating to the employment of enlisted men ashore in the capacity of household servants.

On no. 42: Relating to the use of the appropriation "Increase of the Navy" for personal services and contingent and miscellaneous expenses in connection with the construction of vessels.

On no. 44: Relating to data to accompany bids for constructing naval vessels.

On no. 48: Relating to travel expenses of personnel of the services embraced by the Joint Service Pay Act of 1922 under orders home in connection with retirement.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, while there were a number of amendments placed on the bill in the Senate, a goodly number of them had no relation to the amount of money carried in the bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. What is the difference in the appropriations as the bill left the House and as it came from the Senate and as agreed to in your conference report?

Mr. CARY. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I will make an explanation that will give that information.

Mr. McFARLANE. That is what I want.

Mr. CARY. The bill as passed by the House carried direct appropriations totaling $457,805,261, and reappropriations to the total amount of $7,500,000, providing for a total maximum expenditure of $465,305,261. The House bill also carried a contract authorization of $5,000,000.

As passed by the Senate, the direct appropriations totaled $459,606,846, or $1,801,585 more than the House bill; reappropriations were increased by $5,690,000, or to $13,190,000; and the contract authorization was raised from $5,000,000 to $8,180,000, or by $3,180,000.

As agreed to by your conferees, the bill carries in direct appropriations $879,118 in excess of the total amount approved by the House, the Senate conferees having receded from $922,467 of the total amount added by the Senate, and from the reduction made in the amount proposed by the House for the Naval Research Laboratory.

The agreed increase is distributed as follows:

Reopening Naval Training Station, Great Lakes, various objects	$142,940

The House provided a flat sum for the reopening of the naval training station and the Department indicated to the Senate a number of additional things that would need to be provided for and these required an additional appropriation of $142,940.

Contingent expenses, Newport Training Station	$12,500
New ferry for use at Newport, R. I	350,000

We were clearly convinced of the need for a new ferry. It was just a question of whether it should be started now or a year later. There seemed to be no reason for deferment because it is something that is absolutely necessary.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is not that a little high for that ferry?

Mr. CARY. I should not say so.

Clothing for Marine Corps Reserve	$103,378
Maintenance and operation, naval aircraft and air stations	265,300
Printing historical naval records	5,000
Making a total of	879,118

As to reappropriations, we bring back a total $7,500,000, but differently allocated than in the House bill. The House bill, it will be recalled, carried $7,500,000 of reappropriations for the purpose of purchasing and creating a reserve supply of domestically produced and processed strategic minerals.

Mr. McFARLANE. What kind of minerals?

Mr. CARY. For strategic war minerals. The Senate struck out this proposal and diverted the money toward making available a larger amount to the extent of $11,690,000 for new ship construction than the House had proposed, making up the difference between the $7,500,000 and the $11,690,000 by additional reappropriations. The Senate also added by way of reappropriations $1,500,000 for the purchase of machine tools, making the Senate total of reappropriations $13,190,000.

The House conferees have acceded to these Senate changes except as to the item on account of new ship construction. Instead of an addition of $11,690,000 on account of new ship construction we bring back $6,000,000.

In other words, we had a compromise on this item. The Senate wanted to add $11,690,000 and we compromised and fixed it at $6,000,000.

Mr. McFARLANE. Were there any other compromises that were made in favor of the House figures?

Mr. CARY. If the gentleman will read the conference report or listen to this statement he will find there were a number of such compromises. I direct the gentleman's attention to the report which has just been read by the Clerk.

Mr. McFARLANE. I have just been reading the report and I have noticed that most of these compromises are in favor of the Senate.

Mr. CARY. The gentleman is very much mistaken about that. The report will not support such an assertion.

Mr. McFARLANE. There were a number of corrections upward, I noticed.

Mr. CARY. It will be recalled that the Budget carries $29,380,000 for beginning the construction of 24 naval vessels. The House provided one-half of such sum, or $14,690,000. The Senate proposed to increase such amount to $26,380,000 by making available $11,690,000 of unobligated balances of certain prior year appropriations. The Conference Committee agreed to a total of $20,690,000, of which $6,000,000 will be made up of unobligated balances of prior year appropriations.

In connection with this matter I wish to say that the Senate conferees were unalterably opposed to an appropriation on account of these 24 new ships that would be insufficient to enable the Department to proceed with their construction as rapidly as contemplated by the Budget estimate.

This was the position the House took when the bill was passed here. We had received information at that time that the figures we had placed in the bill would be sufficient to carry on the program without interrupting the continuity of the program. Since that time the Navy Department had come to the conclusion it would take some more money and the Senate conferees were convinced they were right about it and we agreed with them about it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARY. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, every compromise that has been reached constitutes an increase in the figures fixed by the House?

Mr. CARY. No; that is not a fact. However, as to the funds for ship construction, I will say to the gentleman from New York that we have already embarked upon the program of building the Navy to treaty strength. The vessels to be commenced in 1936 will cost in the neighborhood of $200,000,000. The appropriation we make here is merely an initial appropriation and it matters very little whether it is one figure or another, because the program will go through and the entire amount will have to be appropriated. This is just a question of what amount we appropriate as the initial appropriation to carry forward the program until the Congress convenes again.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I have another brief question which I think we ought to have for the purpose of the RECORD. Can the gentleman state what the total amount will be for naval purposes if this conference report is adopted?

Mr. CARY. I have just given that figure.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I want the total.

Mr. CARY. $458,684,379.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And, as a matter of fact, it is several million dollars under the Budget estimate.

Mr. CARY. It is more than $26,000,000 under the Budget estimate.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARY. I yield.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I notice that you have increased the appropriation for the professors at the Naval Academy by $33,000 to take care of 12.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman wait a moment until I reach that in my statement?

Mr. GAMBRILL. Yes.

Mr. CARY. The amount agreed upon for new ship construction, our information is, will enable work to proceed as rapidly as originally contemplated. Of course, if that be true, the original estimate was over large.

In any event, I wish to say for the benefit of those who feel that this program should wait upon the outcome of the naval conference to be held during this calendar year, that there is no requirement that any of the vessels which such program embraces be laid down at any particular time and the President will be free to defer their commencement if he should conclude that to be the wiser course.

It works out that the amount of reappropriations, as agreed to, corresponds to the amount of reappropriations proposed by the House, so that the increase in direct appropriations of $879,118, which I have already discussed, constitutes the sum total of additional Treasury demands beyond those created by the bill as passed by the House.

Turning to contract authorization, the House bill carried $5,000,000 for the procurement of airplanes. The House cut down the amount in the estimates for spare parts for aircraft from 25 percent to 10 percent, yielding a reduction of $3,180,000. The Senate proposed to restore the whole of this reduction by way of contract authorization. We have compromised, restoring one-half of the House reduction by way of contract authorization.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARY. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What percent of spare parts are here provided for?

Mr. CARY. About 17½ percent.

To summarize, the bill carries a total of $458,684,379 in direct appropriations. Including reappropriations, the amount is $466,184,379. In direct appropriations the amount is $26,759,468 less than proposed in the Budget. Adding reappropriations, we come under the Budget to the extent of $19,259,468.

The statement accompanying the conference report, which has been read, covers both amendments which do and do not affect the amounts of money carried by the bill. I see no occasion further to enlarge upon that statement. Before concluding, however, I wish to clear up some doubt that seems to prevail as to the intention respecting the addition made by the House to the estimate for pay of professors and instructors at the Naval Academy. The original estimates included $232,400 for such purpose—$207,300 for educators and $25,100 for physical instructors. The House—and the Senate conferees have agreed—provided a total of $265,400, of which $242,600 is earmarked for educators and not exceeding $22,800 for physical instructors. For the latter $700 is included for automatic salary increases. There is available, therefore, $35,300 definitely for the employment of additional educators. While the number is not specified, it was the thought of the committee that the increase would permit of the employment of 12, which is the number of former professors at the academy, let out in 1933, eligible or available for reemployment, who have not been reemployed. Whether those 12 former professors will be reemployed rests with the Department and the academy authorities. The increase the bill carries is not sufficient to pay those 12 the salaries they were receiving at the time of separation. Their salaries, if and when reemployed, would need to be accommodated to the amount available.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARY. I yield.

Mr. GAMBRILL. The statement appears in the hearings that you had before your committee a representative of the 12 professors separated from the service in 1933. According to the interrogation of the witnesses by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER], who is a skilled educator, it appears that in his mind, and probably in the mind of the gentleman from Kentucky, the idea that the 12 professors separated from the service should be reinstated. I hope the gentleman will be good enough to enlighten the House as to whether or not that is correct.

Mr. CARY. I will say this. Of course, this matter was brought to our attention, and the committee was sympathetic to those professors whose services it became necessary to terminate. While we realize that the committee has nothing to say about who shall or who shall not be employed, because that is an administrative matter that belongs to the officials of the Navy Department and the Academy, it was our hope that many of the men who were qualified and ought to be retained would be retained. However, we realize that we could not provide that the men separated from the service should be reemployed and if reemployed that they should be paid the salary they got when they were separated from the service.

There is nothing in the bill that would require the reinstatement of the same ones who were separated from the service. We were sympathetic toward them and hoped that they would be reemployed.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I am obliged to the gentleman for this statement, and I want to give it some background.

There were 20 professors at the academy teaching cultural subjects who were separated from the service at a saving of sixty-odd thousand dollars. A few days after their separation, with the idea that they were embarking on an economy program, the Navy Department secured from the Public Works Administration $238,000,000 for building ships of war and $13,000,000 for aircraft.

A year ago I attempted to rectify the wrong done to these professors.

In the bill for the fiscal year 1935 there was an additional appropriation of sixty-odd thousand dollars to take care of reinstatement of 20 professors, but unfortunately a colloquy took place on the floor of the House and the then chairman of the subcommittee used language that could be interpreted that only 8 professors should be reinstated, although the appropriation was sufficient to take care of the reinstatement of the full 20. It was the idea of the committee when it passed the supply bill for 1935 to reinstate eight. It seems to me that this additional amount should be used for the purpose of reinstating the remainder of those professors who were separated from the service in 1933.

One other thought. The gentleman says the appropriation is not sufficient. That is correct. It would require about $41,000, and the gentleman has appropriated $33,000 additional. The gentleman took into consideration, I have no doubt, that probably not all of the 12 would be available, and also took into consideration that probably some of the 12 had secured positions elsewhere, but I certainly hope before the gentleman asks for the passage of this conference report that he will be more liberal and be willing to make a statement that it is the sincere hope of the committee that 12 instructors should be reinstated, or so many as may be available.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I tried to make myself clear on that as to what the committee's idea about it is. We had a number of these men before us, and as I said, we are sympathetic toward them, and I agree with the statement the gentleman from Maryland makes, but he realizes, and I know agrees with me, that this is a matter purely within the discretion of the authorities of the Naval Academy and the Navy Department. However, we hope that such of these men who have not been employed and who have not found work elsewhere and who are available and who are suitable for the positions open might be reemployed. We have nothing to do with that. That is purely administrative.

Mr. PARKS. These are all civilian employees of whom the gentleman speaks?

Mr. CARY. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. Have they been so dissociated from the service that they are gone?

Mr. CARY. Some of them have, but a number of them are within the proximity of the institution and are available.

I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 18: Page 14, line 23, after the word "duty", insert ", and other officers above such grades employed on such class of active duty shall not be entitled to be paid a greater rate of pay and allowances than authorized by law for a lieutenant of the Navy or a captain of the Marine Corps entitled to not exceeding 10 years' longevity pay."

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: ", and other officers above such grades employed on such class of active duty (not to exceed 4 months in any calendar year) shall not be entitled to be paid a greater rate of pay and allowances than authorized by law for a lieutenant of the Navy or a captain of the Marine Corps entitled to not exceeding 10 years' longevity pay."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 28: Page 28, line 23, after the word "expeditions", insert "and in addition not to exceed 40 in number at such places as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 42: Page 51, line 8, after the word "vessels", strike out "heretofore authorized and herein or heretofore appropriated for in part" and insert "which have been or may hereafter be authorized."

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 44: Page 54, after line 13, insert:

"No part of the funds herein appropriated shall be available to pay a contractor upon any contract for a naval vessel entered into under authority of this act unless, at the time of filing his bid, he shall also file the estimates upon which such bid was based."

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 48: Page 62, beginning in line 1, insert:

"SEC. 3. During the fiscal year 1935 and thereafter the words 'permanent change of station' as used in section 12 of the act approved May 18, 1920 (41 Stat. 604), as amended, shall be held to include the home of an officer or man to which he is ordered in connection with retirement."

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the votes by which the various motions were agreed to was laid on the table.

SHIP MORTGAGE ACT

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7205) to amend the Ship Mortgage Act, 1920, otherwise known as "section 30" of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920, to allow the benefits of said act to be enjoyed by owners of certain vessels of the United States of less than 200 gross tons, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7205, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, after "United States", insert "and for the purposes of this act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall, in addition to those designated in sections 37 and 38 of this act, be deemed a citizen of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was concurred in laid on the table.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. CONNERY, RAMSPECK, GRISWOLD, WELCH, and LAMBERTSON.

THE LATE JOSEPH P. HINES

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay a belated tribute to a faithful public servant who died 1 year ago today, after the adjournment of Congress. Joseph P. Hines, of Louisville, Ky., came to Washington in 1912 as secretary to one of my predecessors, Hon. Swagar Sherley, formerly Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. From that time until last year he served in many capacities for the Government in Washington. He was a man who was respected, honored, and beloved by all who knew him. He is dead, but he lives, Mr. Speaker, in the hearts of all who knew him.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the major domo of the Democratic Party announced yesterday there would be no more general debate. He was afraid that someone would "blow off" or "spread false propaganda" against the administration. I am afraid of that myself, and I shall have to object.

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not know who the major domo is.

Mr. SNELL. The major domo was "General" O'CONNOR.

Mr. BOYLAN. I have no connection with the major domo.

Mr. SNELL. If there is going to be no more general debate on this side, there is going to be no more on that side by unanimous consent, even by my good friend Mr. BOYLAN.

Mr. BOYLAN. This is not general debate. This is simply a little address I wanted to make, and it is nonpolitical.

Mr. SNELL. I shall have to object.

CHARLES HENRY NIEHAUS

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, Charles Henry Niehaus, one of America's great men, my dear friend and neighbor, departed this life in Cliffside Park, N. J., Wednesday, June 19, 1935.

When the history of American sculptors shall have been written, his name will be recorded in the forefront.

His art and sculpture will forever adorn this Capitol, the District of Columbia, and many States of the Union.

Surviving him is his loyal daughter, Marie Niehaus, beloved by all who know her for her devotion to, and tender care of, her illustrious father. In paying deserved tribute to my sculptor friend, I feel free to draw liberally from her biography of the great sculptor.

Born in Cincinnati, Ohio, January 24, 1855, he early devoted himself to wood engraving, stonecutting, and carving in marble. While yet a boy he was a capable draftsman, and as a very young man he modeled in clay. His fondness for his work prompted him to become a pupil at the McMicken School of Design, in Cincinnati, where he won first prize in drawing and modeling. Of meager means, but enthusiastic and determined, he traveled to Munich, Germany, where he entered the Royal Academy and there he won his way to honors and a commission. At the time of his matriculation, he gained the distinction of obtaining first-prize medal for composition entitled "Fleeting Time." Before he returned to America, he journeyed through the countries of Europe, viewing the sculpture of the Old World, the masterpieces of the Renaissance period, and the ruins of Athens and Rome. In Manchester, England, before leaving for home, he engaged in executing busts of persons of note, including Lord Disraeli.

Arriving back in America in 1881, he wended his way to his native State of Ohio, and while still a youth received two commissions providing for memorials to the memory of President Garfield. The State of Ohio raised funds for a statue of Garfield to be placed in the rotunda at the Capitol at Washington.

Public subscriptions furnished funds for another statue of Garfield to be erected on Race Street in Cincinnati. The young sculptor who had won his spurs abroad was honored by the people of Ohio with these commissions. His sculpture was such a success that a further commission followed to model the statue of William Allen, a gift of the State of Ohio to Statuary Hall in the Capitol. He had by this time developed his artistic talent, gaining much fame. However, he wished further opportunity for study and experimentation and for that purpose went to Italy. He established a studio in Rome in the Villa Strohl-Fern adjoining the Borghese Palace just outside of Porta del Popolo, devoting his time to production of art for art's sake.

Three of his models have been preserved and are in this country. They are the Scraper, or Greek Athlete Using a Strigil, Caestus, and Silenus. The former received Italian recognition which made him a Fellow of L'Associazione della Artistica Internazionale di Roma. At the World's Columbian Exposition it was recommended for a special medal.

In 1885 he established his studio in New York City and later removed to Cliffside Park, N. J., in the Palisades, overlooking the majestic Hudson River. At these studios he executed his finest sculpture.

As an artist, he obtained membership in the Council of the National Sculpture Society, the Architectural League of America, Municipal Art Society, of the Society for the Preservation of Historic and Scenic Places of the National Arts Club, of the Players Club, and of the Ohio Society.

Mr. Niehaus received the commission to make the statues of Hooker and Davenport and illustrative tympanums for the statehouse of Connecticut. Davenport, suggesting the founding of Yale University and the earliest historic interest of New Haven, and Hooker standing in similar character for Hartford, are the two figures of Connecticut which arose out of the perspective of Pilgrim days. These statues, with the accompanying tympanums, were commissioned to my friend through a committee of which Charles D. Warner was the guiding spirit. Of the completed work, Mr. Warner wrote of them as "spirited and beautiful."

When the Municipal Art Society of the city of New York offered prizes for designs for drinking fountains for city streets, Mr. Niehaus furnished 5 designs, 5 of which were prize winners.

The Astor memorial doors of Trinity Church of New York were the gift of Mr. Astor. Competition determined the choice of the sculptors who were restricted to one subject, and the manner of its treatment was the test of selection not only for the sculptors but for the character of subject which should be assigned him. The subject decided for the competition was the expulsion of the Garden of Eden and from the design submitted, Mr. Niehaus won the award to execute the south or historical doors. In Harpers Weekly, June 10, 1893, Charles de Kay, art critic, wrote descriptively of them and of the history of their gift as follows:

Bronze doors in one piece and decorated with panels carved in relief are Mr. William Waldorf Astor's gift to Trinity Church in memory of his father, the late John Jacob Astor. * * * The massive look of the doors and the color of the bronze, somber yet rich, suit very well the stately architecture of Trinity and the somber but warm tones of the stone.

John Jacob Astor, second of the name, took great pride in Trinity and enriched the chancel with a costly reredos. He was the most faithful of vestrymen, and until his last years rarely failed to carry about the plate for the offertory; so that to the worshippers in Trinity these doors will recall his tall and dignified figure, his kindly, urbane face. They will recall his unaffected modesty and readiness to interest himself in all public and social affairs, from the call to arms at the outbreak of the Civil War to the functions that are mere weariness to the flesh to a conscientious man past middle age. But to the general public they are very notable embellishments of the city, owing to the conspicuous place Trinity occupies on Wall Street and Broadway. It was a happy thought to make sculptured doors the memorial for a site so central and so close to the swiftest tide of traffic—a thought which, in all likelihood, came to the son because of his early studies in sculpture.

The south door, by Mr. Niehaus, has six panels dealing with historical subjects connected with New York and Trinity Parish. The lowest panels show the deck of the Half Moon; Henry Hudson is passing, in 1609, along Manhattan Island under the Dutch flag; Dr. Barclay is preaching to the Indians. To fit the mission among the redskins more closely to this church, Mr. Niehaus has passed by the earlier efforts of Dutch dominies in the same field. The middle panels show Washington entering St. Paul's, the chapel of Trinity, after his inauguration in 1789; and the scene of a consecration of four bishops in the same chapel in 1832. The upper panels contain the procession in 1846 through the porch of new Trinity as we now have it, soon after its completion; and the reredos in memory of William B. Astor in 1877.

In these six panels the sculptor has undertaken a difficult task of realism, and with success. The composition is generally excellent; the perspective is particularly brilliant. Mr. Niehaus has kept marvelously well the difficult planes of figures, buildings, and interiors, each in its proper place, and has borrowed from painting many artifices which permit the eye to pass agreeably from the near to the more distant objects. The figures never press forward but keep their relations to the general aspect of the door as a door, and also to their several backgrounds. The figures, moreover, are well proportioned and unconventional.

The most modern scene is, in some respects, the best, although it might easily have been the worst, owing to the difficulty of managing modern coats, hats, and dresses, and presenting in low relief an interior known to everyone. He has done this without being commonplace or trivial. Henry Hudson is the least convincing of all, because we look for more rough and sailorly qualities in the captain and crew of the Half Moon than the sculptor has been willing to allow.

Some 50 artists and sculptors executed the pictorial and plastic aspects for the Congressional Library at the National Capital. There are 16 statuary figures representing foremost characters almost from the beginning of history. Mr. Niehaus received the commission for Moses as typifying the Law and Gibbon as representing History.

Mr. Niehaus also executed for the Congressional Library three door spandrels which were carved in wood from his designs.

When a place in the rotunda of the Capital was reserved for two renowned sons of each of the States, Ohio sent the figures of Garfield and William Allen, executed by Niehaus. The latter was famous as a speaker, and the quality of his voice won him the sobriquet of "Foghorn Bill Allen." Mr. Niehaus represented him as an orator in a positive attitude. President Garfield was represented by him as the statesman-orator; his rostrum was beside him, and out of sentiment for his untimely death a wreath with crossed palms was laid at his feet.

In 1900 the State of Indiana provided for a statue to the memory of its war Governor, Oliver P. Morton. A product of Mr. Niehaus, it was sent by the State for a place in the rotunda of the Capital.

In the Senate Chamber, too, can be found a bust of Vice President Tompkins, by Niehaus.

The Hahnemann Monument at Scott Circle in Washington bears further testimony to the art and skill of Charles H. Niehaus. The Homeopathists of America provided the funds for this work. In their published report is found the following:

It was decided to ask sculptors to submit sketches for competition, and to award prizes for the best three. * * * Twenty-four models were submitted by sculptors from St. Louis, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, New Haven, Brooklyn, and New York, as well as Paris, Rome, and Florence, representing American, French, German, Spanish, and Italian sculpture. They were exhibited to the public at the gallery of the American Academy of Fine Arts during the week beginning February 4, 1895, being the first exhibition of the kind in this country. The press was invited to a private view, whereby attention was called to the undertaking and a notoriety given it that no other similar sculptural work has obtained. The committee, together with the advisory committee of the National Sculpture Society, consisting of Messrs. Daniel C. French, George E. Bissell, Olin L. Warner, representing the sculptors, Thomas Hastings and Russell Sturgis representing the architects, unanimously awarded the first prize to the American sculptor, Charles H. Niehaus, and his design was accepted as the model for the proposed monument.

The unveiling of the monument took place on June 21, 1900. President McKinley was present to make an address. The Washington Star, describing the monument, said in part:

The monument which will thus be added to the art treasures of the Nation's Capital is, in the opinion of the National Sculpture Society, under whose auspices the competition for the design of the monument was carried on, as well as others who are qualified to form an opinion, a beautiful as well as an appropriate creation of art. The sitting statue of Hahnemann occupies the central point on the stone platform, which is approached from the front by four steps, and at the back of which rises the superstructure, which is elliptical in form. The treatment is Greek in spirit, and the details are in harmony with this conception. The central portion of the superstructure forming the background of the statue is composed of four columns supporting an entablature. Above this rises what is known as an "attica", bearing the principal inscription: "Hahnemann." Between the two front columns is a niche, which is also elliptical in form, and which terminates in a semicircular arch. Along the base of the elliptical wall are stone seats. Upon the pedestal supporting the statue is the inscription "Similia similibus curantus." On either side of the arch are decorative emblems in bas-relief, a bowl and serpent, the symbols of wisdom, and a lamp and book, typical of knowledge. In two panels in either side of the niche are placed commemorative tablets, representing in bas-relief of bronze the four epoch-making periods of Hahnemann's life, namely, the nightly vigils of the student, the investigation of the chemist, the teacher addressing his class in the university, and the success of his treatment of typhus patients at the hospital. The statue itself is of bronze, the features copied from the bust made by the famous artist, David.

The sculptor, Mr. C. H. Niehaus, whose design has been so successfully wrought out, took into consideration the fact in completing the details that the monument was to be in an open space, so that it could be observed from all sides. He therefore sought to make it attractive from every point of view, and gave much attention to the designing of the rear. The main lines of the central portion of the elliptical wall are repeated in the rear, excepting that the niches are omitted, and in the upper portion there is a decorative tympanum. Across the center, in roman numerals, appear the date of erection and the dates of Hahnemann's birth and death, the latter being encircled with laurel wreaths. In the tympanum of the arch are two figures in bas-relief emblematic of the science of medicine. Underneath this is a fountain in the form of a fluted basin, with a stream of water issuing from a carved dolphin.

The plaster model of the figure of Hahnemann won a gold medal at the Pan American Exposition.

During the campaign of President McKinley for reelection the Ohio Society of New York honored my late sculptor friend by a banquet, for which extensive preparations were made. Among them was the plan to have predominating a huge bust of the President. Mr. Niehaus undertook this work, but abandoned the idea of an exaggerated size when time did not serve to carry out the original intention. Accordingly he executed a life-size half figure of President McKinley in his characteristic attitude of speaking. Following the tragedy at Buffalo the bust was placed on exhibition at Tiffany's, and within a short time the Honorable Charles H. Hackley, a former patron of the sculptor, commissioned Mr. Niehaus to execute a statue. The design shows McKinley as he made his famous speech at the Pan American Exposition the day preceding his assassination. Circling the base of the statue are the words "Our future conquests must lie in the victories of peace."

When the Appellate Division Courthouse, located at Madison Avenue and Twenty-fifth Street, New York, was being erected, its architect, James Brown Lord, selected Mr. Niehaus as advisory sculptor and gave him the largest piece to execute, that of the 50-foot pediment over the entrance. Mr. Niehaus' group for the pediment defines the Triumph of the Law, the subject being centered in a seated female figure supporting two tablets bearing the inscription, respectively, of Lex Scripta and Lex Tradita. Upon her right and left Courage and Valor draw their swords in her defense, and Strength, Wisdom, and Antiquity, with details of symbols, attend her.

At the behest of the Honorable Charles Hackley, the donor, Mr. Niehaus executed the statues of Farragut and Lincoln for Hackley Square, Muskegon, Mich. They were unveiled Memorial Day, 1900. Another statue of Lincoln, similar but distinctive, was made by Mr. Niehaus for the Buffalo Historical Society.

Among his other works, Mr. Niehaus, shortly after establishing his studio at New York, executed the relief known as "Surrender of the Hessians" on the monument to Washington, at Trenton, in my State of New Jersey.

In the Monument News of November 1901 there appears a reproduction of the Drake Monument at Titusville, Pa., together with the following description:

The nucleus of the design is a classic fane of simple Grecian type, approached by a semicircular sweep of low steps and adorned with four ionic columns. It encloses a vaulted and arched niche in which is mounted in a half-seated, half-crouching attitude on a circular pedestal a bronze heroic figure, The Driller, symbolizing the energy of labor and modeled by Charles H. Niehaus. Extending from each side of the fane are curved wings forming the backs of seats and terminating in pillars bearing symbolic figures carved in high relief. The wings are 12 feet high and extend to a width of 28 feet, while the highest point of the roof over the central figure is 18 feet from the base.

The Driller is a forceful example of Mr. Niehaus' work, and shows a magnificently muscled figure with uplifted hammer in the act of driving the drill into the rock. It is instinct with life and vigor, and is strikingly adapted to typifying a pioneer of industry. The figures at the ends of the wings are symbolic representations of Memory and Grief. Memory, to the left of the monument, is a heavily draped figure, in the act of weaving a chaplet, to commemorate the dead. Grief, to the right, is shown carrying an urn, around which is carved the ivy of devotion. The wings are divided into six panels, perforated at the top in latticed design, and each one bearing an inscription telling part of the story of Mr. Drake's life and achievements. No representation of him is to be found on the monument, the idea being to typify his works by suggestive artistic figures rather than to attempt portraiture.

The work was constructed for Mr. C. N. Payne, of the National Transit Co., who represented an unknown donor, supposed to be one of the officials of the Standard Oil Co.

At the Pan American Exposition there was represented more garden sculpture than ever before at any exposition. The series of fountains, groups, and architectural decorations constitute special features of the exposition. Mr. Niehaus contributed two of the largest groups of the Fountain of Nature.

In June 1901 the Chicago Inter Ocean referred to Mr. Niehaus' groups with the following:

Charles H. Niehaus contributes two of the groups of the commissioned sculpture. These, in representing the subject Mineral Wealth, he has centralized into the Story of Gold and the Story of Light, as interpreting, respectively, solid and fluid mineralogy. In the Story of Gold the Genius of Opportunity is seen calling through her fingers to waken the world to its waiting possibilities, and in the Story of Light the Genius of Inspiration is holding aloft a torch to show the source of enlightment. About these pivotal female figures the sculptor has further elaborated his theme by male figures engaged in the manual unfolding of the Story of Gold and the Story of Light, each one's occupation allowing the artist a wide range of muscular posing and vigorous treatment.

In the Story of Gold one man is carrying a wand of witch-hazel, which he stretches out searchingly for the magnetic response which indicates the gold's location; another is digging for the ore; while still another is washing it in a stream. One of the graceful and harmonious bits is the introduction of a primitive crucible with a man smelting the precious treasure, while a restful and human touch is given in two figures, one of which stops in his work to engage in conversation with his fellow laborer near by.

The Story of Light is more subtle in its conception, although hardly less vigorous or versatile in its handling. As in its companion group, the conceived idea is conveyed in an allegorical female figure towering over the actual group. The woman is the Genius of Inspiration and she holds aloft her torch of enlightenment.

In this, as in the other groups, Mr. Niehaus has used primitive utensils as graceful accessories to make his groups hang together effectively. One man is drilling for gas; another is beside a tripod; one is blowing glass. Each figure in both of the groups has been carefully studied; any one of them might well stand for the central idea of the entire group in which it is incorporated as a part.

The Dewey Arch, while an ephemeral undertaking, was the associated labor of the representative sculptors of America. Mr. Niehaus executed one of the four groups featured on the sides. It was called Triumphant Return. This was in commemoration of the victory of Admiral Dewey at Manila.

Mr. Niehaus also executed the design for the equestrian statue of Forrest, the great cavalry leader, for erection at Memphis, Tenn.

Other notable works of this prolific and eminent sculptor are: Bust of Hon. Charles H. Hackley, Muskegon, Mich.; bust of Robert Blum, Art Museum, Cincinnati, Ohio; colossal statue of St. Louis and group for St. Louis, Mo.; bust of Rev. Dr. Collier, Cooper Union, New York; statue of Hon. J. J. Ingalls, Statuary Hall, National Capital; bust of H. H. Rogers; McKinley Statue and Lunette National Memorial, Canton, Ohio; Harrison Monument, Indianapolis, Ind.; Beardsley Monument, Bridgeport, Conn.; statue of Governor Goebel, Frankfort, Ky.; pediment for new State capitol, Frankfort, Ky.; John Paul Jones Monument, Washington, D. C.; Commodore Perry Monument, Buffalo, N. Y.; Zachariah Chandler statue, Statuary Hall, National Capitol; Governor Glick statue, Statuary Hall, National Capital; Hernandez Cortez statue, World's Fair, San Francisco, Calif.; Francis Scott Key Monument, Baltimore, Md.; Soldiers' and Sailors' Memorial, Hoboken, N. J.; Soldiers' and Sailors' Memorial, Newark, N. J.; Soldiers' and Sailors' Memorial, Hackensack, N. J.; Soldiers' and Sailors' Memorial, Des Moines, Iowa; Henry Clay, Statuary Hall, Washington, D. C.; E. McDowell, Statuary Hall, Washington, D. C.

His last work was a bust of Abraham Lincoln now in his late home in Cliffside Park, N. J. I have viewed this work with admiration and reverence. Character, as exemplified by Lincoln, radiates from this wonderful achievement of the sculptor. Of the finest grade of Cararra marble, especially transparent, cut by chisel throughout, it is veritably a treasure—a treasure of art.

Any one of his productions would have gained him fame; his combined works, which have added immeasurably to the national wealth, at the Capitol and over the Nation, place him among our immortals.

THE NECESSITY FOR AN ADEQUATE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE AND PACIFIC COAST SHIPBUILDING

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by revising and bringing up to date the remarks I made on April 29 last with reference to our merchant marine.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, during the present session of Congress I have invited the attention of the House of Representatives to some of the problems of the American merchant marine. The President of the United States has forcefully brought this matter to the attention of the Nation by sending a special message to Congress dealing with the subject. More recently the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I am glad to be a member, has held hearings on this problem and has reported favorably a bill, H. R. 8555, which I confidently believe will meet the needs of the present situation.

We are all in common accord that an adequate merchant marine is necessary. It is necessary in time of peace in order that the entry of American goods into world channels of trade might be guaranteed equality in transportation costs with that of other nations. It is necessary in time of war in which the United States may not be engaged in order to carry on trade and commerce when the ships of other nations might be withdrawn to assist their own navies. It is necessary that we might have an adequate naval auxiliary to meet our own war-time requirements for the transportation of troops, supplies, and equipment. It is necessary that we have adequate shipbuilding facilities always available on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts prepared to meet any emergency requirement.

The President has emphasized these reasons and has stated that direct ship subsidies should be made—

> Based upon providing for American shipping, Government aid to make up the differential between American and foreign shipping costs. It should cover, first, the difference in the cost of building ships; second, the difference in the cost of operating ships; and, finally, it should take into consideration the liberal subsidies that many foreign governments provide for their shipping.

Our own experience and the heavy outlays that have been necessary whenever emergencies have arisen point to the urgency of this matter. The United States could have maintained an adequate merchant marine from the foundation of the country up to the World War at one-half the expense that was necessary at the beginning of that war had we maintained a far-sighted policy. Instead, we permitted American manufacturers and producers to depend on foreign bottoms for shipping American goods. When these ships were withdrawn from trade routes our commerce was helpless. We cannot permit that condition to ever exist again.

Every major maritime nation upon the face of the earth subsidizes its merchant marine directly and openly. The United States stands alone among the nations of the world as one with major maritime interests granting subsidies by subterfuge, under the guise of mail contracts. The time has come when we must recognize the national necessity and purpose of an adequate merchant marine by granting these subsidies openly and directly. They should be granted for ship construction to meet the unfair competition imposed by lower standards of living and consequent cheaper costs in foreign countries. They should be granted for ship operation to such routes in international, intercoastal, and coastal trade that will stimulate commerce, insure flexibility in operation, parity in competition, and surety in protection. The savings to American agriculture and industry thus effected will be far greater than the direct cost to the United States Government and will ultimately save the American taxpayer large sums.

The impetus given to a study of our merchant marine problems by our experience during the World War brought about an orderly plan in its development, but the time has now come when we must rehabilitate and maintain our merchant marine at its highest efficiency in accordance with that plan.

While the United States ranks second only to Great Britain in gross tonnage available for ocean-going traffic, a large part of it is what may be termed "static tonnage." Many of these vessels built during and immediately following the World War cannot meet the competition of modern ships. Technical advances made in type, machinery, and equipment of ocean-going vessels has actually caused the United States merchant fleet to drop to fourth or fifth place among the nations. It is surpassed by every major maritime nation when measured in its ability to quickly and economically carry cargoes from port to port.

Of our entire merchant marine, the United States has only built 11 percent since January 1, 1924, while Great Britain has built 42 percent; Germany, 38 percent; France, 25 percent; Italy, 28 percent; and, Japan, 21 percent. With 89 percent of our merchant marine composed of ships over 11 years old, economy in their operation and fair competition with the ships of other nations is almost futile.

Fuel consumption alone is 30 to 40 percent less on modern vessels than on those built 12 years ago. Mechanical equipment has been improved during the past decade to reduce costs, and other operation costs are similarly higher on older ships. In these times when speed of delivery is a major economic factor, the delays caused by the slower movement of these older vessels adds appreciably to the handicap American shipping has to overcome, as well as to operation costs. Steps must be taken now to regain the cargoes we are losing in ever-increasing numbers.

Coincident with the need for an adequate merchant marine is the need for adequate shipbuilding facilities on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. No greater insurance can be given for the success of our Navy than to have proper private shipbuilding and ship-repair yards always available to meet our needs in emergency. The problems involved are much easier of solution on the Atlantic seaboard than on the Pacific coast. At the same time, the need is probably far greater on the Pacific coast than on the Atlantic.

I can recall when shipbuilding was one of the major industries of the Pacific coast. Today it is almost a lost art. Thousands of artisans who formerly worked in shipyards have had to turn their efforts to other lines of trade. Not a single large merchant vessel has been built on the Pacific coast since the World War. With the advent of metal ships, sources of raw material are so distant that shipbuilders, looking primarily to profits, practically ceased west-coast construction because they could not meet east-coast prices and pay the costs of transportation of supplies to the Pacific.

Under present merchant marine legislation we have loaned $150,000,000 at nominal rates of interest for ship construction. Every dollar of that money has entered into ships constructed within a few hundred miles of this Capitol Building. Certainly, we do not mean national security includes only shipyards within a short radius of Washington. If the primary purpose of this ship-subsidy legislation is to build our merchant marine and shipyards for national security, it must include shipyards on the Pacific coast as well as the Atlantic.

The result of all this has been that there is today not a single privately owned major shipyard on the Pacific coast capable of building a capital ship without first spending large sums to repair their equipment. Notwithstanding this, the United States needs such plants to be available in event of emergency. It must encourage private ship construction on the Pacific coast to guarantee the availability of such shipyards in time of war.

As I have already pointed out, the President has stated as the first purpose in granting these subsidies is to make up the differential between American and foreign costs of ship construction. If this differential is necessary between American and foreign construction, and we are in agreement that it is, the same principle holds true in ship construction in different sections of the United States. There should be a differential allowed to equalize the differences in cost of shipbuilding on the Pacific and Atlantic seaboards.

At one time the Navy Department recognized this principle by allowing a differential in the cost of ship construction at the navy yards on the Pacific coast to equalize the increases due to transportation costs. Congress should also recognize this need and encourage private ship construction. To this end I recommended to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and they have included in this bill, H. R. 8555, provision for a direct 6-percent differential in favor of the construction of ships in Pacific coast shipyards for vessels to enter into the foreign trade and commerce of the Pacific coast and the equivalent of this 6-percent differential through a three-fourths of 1 percent reduction in the interest rate charged for construction loans on ships constructed on the Pacific coast for domestic trade, coastal or intercoastal, home ports of which will be on the Pacific coast. This principle is agreed as necessary by representatives of the shipping and shipbuilding industry, whose primary interests are on the Atlantic seaboard.

This policy will encourage the rebuilding of shipyards already on the Pacific coast but now used only for ship repairs, thus guaranteeing to the United States adequate ship construction and repair facilities for capital ships, both merchantmen and naval.

The effectiveness of our efforts will depend in some measure upon the administration of such legislation as may be enacted. Upon Congress rests the responsibility of effecting the policy and appropriating the funds. We should now prepare to regain our portion of the world's commerce. We should now stimulate American ship construction in all sections of our coast. If we do not, we cannot hope to overcome the obstacles which will be in our way as international trade increases with improving conditions. Neither can we hope to avoid wasteful expenditure of billions of dollars to provide an adequate naval auxiliary should an international crisis arise. It is the cheapest form of insurance, guaranteeing security to our commerce in time of peace and security to our Nation in time of war.

CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF DISTRICT POSTMASTERS

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered in Martinsburg, W. Va., yesterday on the foundation of the Rural Free Delivery System, made by Assistant Postmaster General J. Austin Latimer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. J. Austin Latimer, Special Assistant to the Postmaster General, at the State convention of the National League of District Postmasters, Martinsburg, W. Va., Friday, June 21, 1935:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it has been my privilege to attend conventions of the League of District Postmasters in a number of States during the past few years, but this is the first occasion on which I have had the pleasure of meeting with you postmasters of West Virginia.

When your able Representative in Congress, and my good friend, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, extended your invitation to me, I accepted with a great deal of pleasure, as it afforded me not only an opportunity to visit your State for the first time, but to appear on this program with him and your National and State officers.

I come here not only to represent the Post Office Department—possibly the greatest business establishment in the world—but to bring you Postmaster General Farley's personal greetings and best wishes for a very successful convention.

As you know, the Post Office Department is fully alive to the advantages and benefits that accrue both to the Department and to each one of you postmasters through such an organization as this. It is the finest medium for the exchange of ideas beneficial to the Postal Service that we can have, and it is so recognized.

No persons in public life have greater opportunities for service than postmasters and other postal workers. You are not only, in many cases, the only direct representative of the Federal Government in your community, but in your daily contacts with the public you have an opportunity and responsibility which few men and women enjoy. The high purposes of government require that, regardless of the race, creed, or political affiliations of your patrons, you give them complete and equal service. As a district postmaster of Mississippi expressed it in a letter appearing in a recent issue of the Postmasters Advocate—

"A postmaster must be, or at least is expected to be, the best-informed person in the community. They must know human nature, the whims, the heartaches, the joys, the financial standing of their entire community, and in addition must know the addresses of all who have moved away, even though they slip off in the nighttime. They must know the cause for the delay in any mail due their patrons when it is called for. In other words, they must be a living, walking, sitting bureau of general information, never failing, never tiring. In order to do so and be all of the above, the postmaster must avail himself of every possible opportunity for informing himself."

The efficiency and courtesy with which you perform this public service, and the dignity with which you conduct yourselves as officers and men ofttimes is the measure of respect your fellow citizens have for the Government.

Just before leaving Washington, I had a little chat with Mr. Martin Scranage, assistant superintendent of the Division of Postmasters, who hails from Fairmont, W. Va., and who was a personal friend of Postmaster General William Lyne Wilson. "Mr. Wilson was indeed a fine man", he said—"one of the ablest men in West Virginia, a wonderful speaker with a wonderful personality, who took particular delight in helping young men in their careers", and I find the printed life of Mr. Wilson corroborates all the fine things Mr. Scranage had to say of him.

Inasmuch as William L. Wilson is the only Postmaster General from West Virginia, and it is quite possible there are some in the audience here today who knew him personally, perhaps it would not be amiss for me to review a few events in the life of this outstanding statesman, best known as the "Father of the Wilson tariff bill", who placed principles above political expediency and duty above self. The New York Times in an editorial concerning Mr. Wilson's work as Postmaster General, made the statement—

"There is not at this moment a single man in public life in the United States who has rendered more practical, difficult, and enduring service."

During his term as Postmaster General, the rural delivery system was put into operation—the first experimental rural delivery service in the United States being established from Charlestown, Uvilla, and Halltown, W. Va., effective October 1, 1896, with H. C. Gibson and Frank Young the first rural carriers. Rules governing promotion in the Department itself, and in the Railway Mail Service were adopted, the purpose of which was to stimulate and reward merit; and a strong and persistent effort was made to secure from Congress the passage of laws for the correction of abuses in second-class mail matter, and for the consolidation of post offices into districts, thereby bringing a large number of the fourth-class office under civil service; reforms whereby the Postal Service of the country would be improved and made self-supporting.

As an educator, statesman, and high Government official, few men have rendered more outstanding service than William Lyne Wilson.

Because my first connection with the Post Office Department was as secretary to Postmaster General Farley, I am particularly interested in coming to the home town of that distinguished Democrat and American, Newton D. Baker, who served in a similar capacity under Postmaster General Wilson. I know that I am voicing not only your sentiments, but those of the entire country, when I say that Mr. Baker is the most outstanding son of Martinsburg living today. It is interesting to note how closely his life was entwined with the lives of those two great Virginian Wilsons—Woodrow and William Lyne, and we are safe in assuming that his close association with Woodrow Wilson while a student at Princeton, and his intimate contact with William Lyne Wilson played an important part in preparing Newton D. Baker for the heavy responsibilities later to be placed on his shoulders.

In the State of West Virginia today there are 425 rural routes covering 11,402 miles, and 268 miles of air mail routes, with three scheduled stops. Prior to the reorganization of the Air Mail Service your State was without any air mail facilities whatsoever, and it took 6 hours for mail to travel by train between two stops in your State where now the airplane carries it in just 1 hour.

In the matter of post offices, I find West Virginia has 1,733 offices—more than any of the other States excepting New York, Pennsylvania, Texas, Virginia, and Kentucky.

As you postmasters, of course, know postal receipts reached low-water mark during July 1933, when they amounted to only forty-two and one-half million dollars. In April of this year the receipts were fifty-four and one-half million, an increase of slightly over 28 percent. Inasmuch as it is generally conceded that the fluctuations of the postal revenues are a good index to business conditions, these figures are certainly encouraging.

Mr. Slattery, our comptroller, recently stated to me, "I feel that the Postal Service is definitely out of the depression insofar as revenues are concerned and that recovery measured in terms of postal revenues is well under way."

What does this mean to you and to me? It means that the pay cut has been restored; that furloughs are a thing of the past; that vacancies are being filled as they occur, except at a few offices where it appears there is still a surplus. It means that since last August hundreds of substitutes have been advanced to regular positions, though the Department is not relaxing its efforts in their behalf.

All this could not be accomplished in a day nor in a year. It could not be accomplished without some hardships. It could not have been accomplished without the loyal and continued cooperation of our entire personnel during that trying, discouraging period of the pay cut and the furlough. But now recovery in the Postal Service is well under way, and in like manner recovery throughout this great country in general is under way as the President's great recovery program swings into action.

I say to you, without hesitation and without fear of successful contradiction, that we have today in the White House one of the greatest administrators this Nation has ever known. In the dark days of early 1932, when the skies were overcast and our country seemed on the brink of disaster, a prominent Democratic politician was asked the question, "What is the greatest need of the Democratic Party?" His answer was, "More Democrats." If I should be asked, "What is the great need of our country today", I would answer in all sincerity, "More men in high places like Franklin D. Roosevelt." Let us of the Postal Service be loyal not only to our own organization and our own Department but, regardless of our political faith, loyal to the administration and our beloved President, who is giving every ounce of his energy and effort to leading this country back to happier days. I know that you feel, as I do, a pride in having a part in the administration of President Roosevelt, and that it is a privilege to help him in his program of relief, recovery, and reform. You know and I know that our great leader is not thinking in terms of political parties, but, like two of his great predecessors, Lincoln and Wilson, the serious responsibility of his leadership makes him conscious of his duty to every American, and we rejoice that Franklin D. Roosevelt has faith in the American people and in the God that watches over them.

MEXICO

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn to an address delivered in New York at the invitation of Station WOR on their forum hour, May 5, 1935, by Mr. Eduardo Villaseñor, Mexican consul general, stationed in New York City. Since the Mexican Government dares to submit its case to the world and more specifically to the judgment of the American people, I feel obliged to refute the numerous falsehoods and misrepresentations which abounded in the discourse of Mr. Villaseñor.

In the first paragraph of his address the Mexican consul general pretends that there is going on a campaign carried out against Mexico "by the Catholic hierarchy." This is a cowardly lie. It is well known that the organ of the Episcopal Church—The Living Church—in this country has more than once condemned the Mexican attitude on religion as a "major scandal in world affairs." Numerous enlightened, intelligent, and fair-minded Protestant prelates and laymen, Jewish rabbis, and leaders of public opinion have in unmistakable terms, and on occasions too numerous to mention, condemned the assault on God which is now being carried on in the Republic of Mexico. Only a few weeks ago there was published in the city of New York a carefully documented volume entitled "Chaos in Mexico", by Dr. Charles S. McFarland, secretary general emeritus of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Dr. McFarland made a careful and extensive visit to Mexico precisely to find out whether religion as such and not merely the Catholic Church was the subject of persecution. He returned a categorical answer on that subject, stating that the assault was one upon the idea of God and religion as such. The American Hebrew has likewise protested against the persecution of all religions in Mexico. Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians have likewise protested against this persecution. The National Conference of Jews and Christians has gone on record in most emphatic terms condemning the official Mexican persecution of religion. Jewish synagogues have been closed in Mexico. Mormon temples in the State of Chihuahua have been closed for the purpose of public worship. Even the schools conducted by British, French, and American citizens have been given the choice of accepting socialistic and gross forms of sexual education or complete elimination from the Mexican scene.

In the second paragraph of his speech, Mr. Villaseñor makes mention of "historical facts." I challenge him to deny the following historical facts: First. That the first hospital on this continent was the Hospital of Jesus in Mexico City; that the first university was founded under religious auspices in Mexico; that the first medical school was erected; and that the first printing press and first book available on the North American Continent were brought from Spain to Mexico by the first Bishop of Mexico City. The first book printed in North America came from the press of Bishop Zummraya. Mr. Villaseñor is the one who has forgotten history and is now making an attempt to distort the facts.

In the third paragraph of his speech Mr. Villaseñor condemns "sectarian sheets" in the United States for the publicity they have given to the extremes of religious persecution practiced in Mexico. Does he consider the New York Times a sectarian sheet? This newspaper printed an authentic report of the murder and assault on innocent men, women, and children at Guadalajara, Mexico. Does he consider S. L. A. Marshall, of the North American Newspaper Alliance, a "sectarian" when he says that in Mexico religious freedom has ceased to exist? And, finally, does he regard Robert Hammond Murray, who has written a splendid series of articles in Today and has published several letters in the New York Times, as a partisan and "sectarian" when he describes the facts of the present persecution in Mexico? None of these gentlemen can be charged with having any tinge of Catholic bias.

In the fourth paragraph of his speech Mr. Villaseñor criticizes books which have been published on this subject. The two books that have been referred to most frequently and favorably by the American press are: First, Chaos in Mexico, by Dr. Charles S. McFarland; and, second, Blood-Drenched Altars, by Bishop Kelley, of Oklahoma. As far as I am aware, not a single fact related in either of the two books has ever been effectively refuted by the Mexican Government.

Mr. Villaseñor does give a summary in brief of the amendment to article 3 of the constitution of Mexico. This statement proves the contradiction to the principles of the natural law upon which the Constitution of the United States was predicated. It reads as follows:

1. Education shall be provided by the state.
2. Education shall be socialistic, divorced from all religious doctrines, and shall combat fanaticism and prejudice in such a way that school activities will create in Mexican youth a rational concept of the world and social life.
3. Only Federal, State, and municipal authorities shall have the right to give primary-, secondary-, or normal-school education.
4. Religious groups of ministers will be forbidden to interfere directly with primary-, secondary-, or normal-school education.
5. The formulation of educational programs shall be entirely under the state control.
6. No private school may function without State authority.
7. Primary education for children shall be compulsory and provided free by the state.

What Mr. Villaseñor fails to note is that this series of laws in itself is a persecution and a species of tyranny.

Mr. Villaseñor asks the following question: "Does nonreligious teaching necessarily imply antireligious education?" To that I answer by revealing the blasphemous version of the "Our Father", that prayer dear to the heart of all who believe in God in His Heaven, which was published in Christo Rey, an official publication of the Government while Garrido Canabal was Minister of Agriculture.

"Our Father, who art not in heaven", for there is neither a God nor any question of sanctity to say nothing of saints—only imbeciles believe in them—"I mock and blaspheme You. May Your kingdom never arrive, pure and upright, and let Your will accomplish itself in burning statues and hanging ministers of religion and in destroying all churches both in the country and in the city."

Apparently Mr. Villaseñor is unaware of the fact that the United States Supreme Court has declared that the parent primarily has the right of education of the child and that the child, in this historic decision, is not a mere creature of the State.

It is a lie that Mexico has had to conquer Catholic resistance at every move toward social progress. Every attack upon the Catholic Church in Mexico during the past 200 years has coincided with a lowering of the standard of living and abridgement of liberty, and has retarded social progress. To give only one example, there was established over 100 years ago one of the most beautiful, a most splendidly equipped and charitably inspired orphanage, by Bishop Cabañas in Guadalajara, Mexico. This saintly prelate begged alms to erect this orphanage for the abandoned boys and girls of Mexico, traveling on foot from the jungles of Yucatan to the arid, desertlike plain of Sonora. Now 100 years after his death, in an institution built by Christian charity and inspired, if any institution in the world was ever inspired, by the love of God, it is not permitted to mention religion or to speak of goodness, conscience, or divine love. If you visit the orphanage of Padre Cabañas today you will find not a single emblem of religion; you will be greeted by no hymn in praise of the Deity. No words of the supernatural life are spoken within the precincts of that charitable institution originally consecrated to the love of God. On the contrary, children are paraded before you singing with pathetic accent the ribald songs of the streets, and the cheap tunes of the jazz age, "I love you, I hate you, I could kill you, kissing you."

The Cabañas orphanage and others like it built through the sacrifice of religious and laymen throughout Mexico in past centuries are now the object of destruction and fanatical attack inspired by those who undertake to speak for the poor and the dispossessed. They show their love for the poor by destroying their orphanages which have served to ameliorate their condition and care for the children of the poor throughout the centuries, when the radicals and their kind were too busily engaged in furthering their own interests at the expense of their fellows to join in giving alms for the relief of the unfortunate.

Toward the end of his address Mr. Eduardo Villaseñor has the audacity to claim that not a single one of the 50,000 federal employees of the present administration have been discharged on account of religion. He disregards entirely the authentic report carried by the Associated Press and other national press services last October—which gave the names and the number of those internes and nurses who had been discharged from their positions in hospitals because of their refusal to take part in an anti-God demonstration of the Mexican Government.

However, in order to give the lie direct to this charge and to put on record something which 20 years ago would have horrified the people of the world, I am going to give the names of two eminent world-renowned artists and scholars who, simply because they failed to march in the atheistic demonstration of the Mexican Government, were discharged from their positions. I refer to Don Frederigo Mariscal, chief architect of the National Palace of Fine Arts in Mexico City, celebrated in artistic circles throughout the world for his genius and honored universally for his noble character. The second was a Protestant, Dr. Alonzo Caso, the most gifted archeologist in the employ of the Federal Government, a gentleman who accompanied the party which exhibited the jewels, found in the State of Oaxaca, on a triumphal tour of the United States. Dr. Caso exhibited the archeological treasures of his native land in the Pennsylvania Station in New York City and in the Union Station in the city of Washington. He has many friends in the United States and also in Europe and South America. Here were two outstanding artists and scholars whose names I furnish for your records and who are known everywhere for their genius and scholarship. They were dismissed from their positions because of their refusal to join in a demonstration against the sacred majesty of God. This was one of the most criminal blows struck at the ideals of art, culture, and religion in the whole history of mankind.

On the last page of his address the Mexican consul general states that the Mexican Embassy in Washington gave a statement to the press on February 28, 1935, denying that the Government of Mexico has ever authorized any Federal board of education or any single one of its teachers throughout the Republic to compel anybody, either teacher or pupil, to sign the pledge which appeared in American newspapers. Once more I refer to the book by Dr. Charles S. McFarland. His researches verified the oath. I also refer you to the text of the oath administered in the State of Michoacan to teachers throughout the State and countersigned by the federal inspector of education:

QUESTIONNAIRE

Name _____ Age _____
Civil condition _____
Normal school graduate or not _____
Name of institution _____

I. Declaration of adherence to article 3 of the constitution (socialistic education).

II. Declaration of purpose to inculcate doctrines of socialism of the Republic.

III. I declare my purpose to teach without reservation the postulates and principles as they are proposed by the National Government.

IV. I declare absolutely that I do not profess either the Catholic faith or any other religion.

V. I declare absolutely that I will combat by all possible means the efforts of the Catholic clergy and all other ministers of religion.

VI. I declare absolutely that I will not practice any act of religion, interior or exterior, be it of the Catholic Church or any other religion.

Place and date _____

(Signature of teacher)

The inspector of federal education who affixes his name must ascertain that the above signature is the one employed by the teacher in all his official business.

(Signature of inspector)

There are photostatic copies of these oaths in Washington and in Baltimore showing the names the teachers have signed and also the name the inspector of education has signed.

In other words, Mr. Villaseñor will have to furnish us with something better than mere denials of these facts that have been vouched for by the highest authority and reported by eye witnesses of these events which clearly establish the opposition of the Mexican Government to religious liberty and the love of God.

H. R. 7810, TO AMEND THE NATIONAL BANNKRUPTCY LAW

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 7810, a bankruptcy act which I introduced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the following statement is submitted with respect to H. R. 7810, in the nature of an act to amend the national bankruptcy law.

Let me explain at the outset that the bill I have introduced is not an amendment to any bill heretofore introduced by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] nor designed in any way to interfere with the operation of the Frazier-Lemke Act; but, on the other hand, to make it possible for that act to be more generally availed of by those desiring to obtain its benefits.

One of the objects of the bill is to derive for the Government a return for the expense being incurred by the Government in administering the bankruptcy law. The bill, if passed, will enable the Treasury to get its share of a large volume of expenditures flowing in other directions. When the national bankruptcy law was passed in 1898 the creditor class, which was responsible for the drafting of the law, desired to make the expense of the administration thereof as low as possible. To that end it was provided in the law that the United States should obtain the benefit of a docket fee paid to the clerk of the court. No matter how long the estate remained in court, nor how many orders were entered therein, nor how much money was disbursed in the proceeding, the return to the Government could not exceed the docket fee. The clerk received a salary and paid his fees into the Treasury. So the entire sum of $10 in each and every proceeding was the sum total of the amount realized by the Government. For example, a case was recently argued in the Supreme Court of the United States arising under section 74 in which the Government realized only the docket fee of $10, and the referee was paid $20,000. The referee is now claiming an additional compensation of $110,000, but there is no way by which the Government can claim for itself more than the original $10. In one case pending in Maryland, a holding corporation owns large blocks of stocks in several transcontinental railway systems. The assets amount to several hundred millions of dollars, and the costs taxed in favor of the Government under section 77 of the present law will be $130. In the many bankruptcy proceedings pending in the United States, thousands of dollars are being paid out in the fees or receivers, trustees, referees, attorneys, bondholders' committees, reorganization managers, and investment bankers, while the amount received by the Government which provides the machinery by which the desired results are accomplished is a mere pittance. In the meantime the Government is called upon to pay the salaries of judges, of deputy clerks, and other officials, and to pay out large sums of money by way of stationery and other expenses. Subdivision (a) of the proposed bill will remedy this state of affairs.

Subdivision (b) is administrative of the provisions contained in subdivision (a).

Subdivision (c) is of especial importance in cases arising under sections 74 and 75 where the principal assets are usually covered by mortgages in excess of the value thereof. The effect of subdivision (c) is to make the allowances for costs, especially attorneys' fees, also wages deemed preferential under section 64 (b) payable out of the estate prior to the mortgage on the assets.

Subdivision (d) provides for the payment of certain costs in the circumstances therein stated out of the United States Treasury. Subdivision (d) is the only provision in the bill which calls for an expenditure of public funds. It is believed that the amount which may be paid into the Treasury under subdivisions (a) and (b) of the act, will be largely in excess of the amount paid out under subdivision (d) and may be more than sufficient to pay the total expense incurred by the Government in administering the bankruptcy law in its entirety, leaving a surplus to the Government.

Subdivision (e) is applicable only to individuals. It is to the interest of society that insolvent individuals be financially rehabilitated. This principle is the justification of the national bankrutcy law. Under the present law an insolvent individual is given permission to file proceedings under sections 74 or 75, but in many cases is entirely without funds with which to obtain this relief. The result is that attorneys confronted with the problems of existence and interested in earning a living are not giving attention to the bankruptcy law; hence insolvent debtors are not able to obtain adequate professional assistance and are practically denied the benefit of the present bankruptcy laws.

Subdivision (f) is important with respect to claims for personal injuries, including injuries resulting in death, and claims for workmen's compensation. The general bankruptcy law was written from a commercial point of view and did not make any provision for the allowance of such claims against the estate of a bankrupt. An effort was made to remedy this omission in section 4 of the act of June 7, 1934. But as written that section seems to mean that if a person is injured, that thereafter the wrongdoer is adjudicated a bankrupt and the injured person thereafter dies the claim is not provable. In other words, the death must occur before the adjudication in order to make the claim therefor provable.

As to other damages, that is, damages for personal injury other than workmen's compensation, under clause 6½ of section 4, a cause of action for negligence under that clause is not provable as a claim against the estate of a bankrupt unless a suit was pending against the bankrupt at the time the petition was filed. Under the act of June 18, 1934, such claims were not provable in any proceeding in bankruptcy which had not been finally closed, but which had been pending for more than 6 months.

Subdivision (g) fixes a time within which claims arising under section (f) may be provable.

Subdivision (h) is applicable to claims of the character specified in subdivision (f); that is, claims for personal injuries, death arising therefrom, and workmen's compensation. These claims are made payable in full under the proposed bill prior to outstanding liens or mortgages.

Subdivision (i) is intended to cover an attempted evasion of subdivisions (f) and (h). If such an attempt is made by filing a suit in equity in which provision is not made for the payment of the claims now being discussed, then such omission is made an act of bankruptcy. So that it would be possible, in case of such evasion, to then have the debtor adjudicated a bankrupt and thus make subdivisions (f) and (h) fully operative.

Subdivision (j) makes it clear that the provisions of the bill are retroactive.

No attempt has been made in this statement to argue the justice or the propriety of the proposed bill. That task will be reserved until the committee to which the bill is referred shall have made its report thereon.

APPLICATIONS FOR LOANS UNDER HOME OWNERS' LOAN ACT OF 1933

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 332) to provide an additional period of time within which to file applications for loans under the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 332

Joint resolution to provide an additional period of time within which to file applications for loans under the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933

Resolved, etc., That the first sentence in subsection (c) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) In order to provide for applications heretofore filed, for applications filed within 60 days after this amendment takes effect, and for carrying out the other purposes of this section, the Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $4,750,000,000, which may be exchanged as hereinafter provided, or which may be sold by the Corporation to obtain funds for carrying out the purposes of this section or for the redemption of any of its outstanding bonds; and the Corporation is further authorized to increase its total bond issue for the purpose of retiring its outstanding bonds by an amount equal to the amount of the bonds to be so retired (except bonds retired from payments of principal on loans), such retirement to be at maturity or by call or purchase or exchange or any method prescribed by the Board with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no bonds issued under this subsection, as amended, shall have a maturity date later than 1952."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know if there is not someone on the majority side who is going to object to consideration by unanimous consent of such an extended resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. The only change which the resolution makes in the present law is to extend the time from 30 days to 60 days.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York withhold his objection to permit me to make a statement?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly I will withhold the objection to permit the gentleman to make a statement, but I assure the gentleman I am going to object.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, the only change this resolution will effect will be to extend the period within which applications may be filed from 30 days to 60 days. The bill passed by Congress became effective on May 28 and provided that applications might be filed for 30 days after the effective date of the act. This time expires on June 27. I have heard from my part of the country that people who might possibly desire to make applications for loans are not aware of the fact that the time expires so soon. My purpose in introducing this resolution is to have the time extended to July 27 in order that those who are not informed and who are not aware of their rights may have that opportunity to file their applications.

An article appearing in this morning's paper indicates that there is plenty of money left to take care of these applications. At the time the act was passed we expected 160,000 mortgagors would file applications, but up to the 13th of this month only 33,545 applications had been filed. It was expected that the entire sum of $1,750,000,000 would be used, but, as a matter of fact, the applications filed up to this time will take but $1,100,000,000. So there is ample money to take care of further applications, and my desire is simply that we afford the people of the country who want to take advantage of this act ample time within which to file their applications.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Every word in the resolution is the present law except the one change from 30 days to 60 days. Is not this correct?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. But in order to comply with the technicalities of drafting legislation the gentleman had to repeat the language of the present law in his resolution.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. That is the only change brought about by the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this is an important piece of legislation and has been on the statute books only 20 days. If an amendment of the law is necessary, the amendment should be considered by the proper committee and go through the regular channels.

Mr. Speaker, I object to taking up the matter in this way.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TEXAS CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 264.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 131, a joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebration to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, etc. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 101]

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-seven Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. DIES, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

TEXAS CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]. I shall consume only a few minutes of the time of the House.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule to permit consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 131, which has passed the Senate, and which authorizes the appropriation of $3,000,000 for participation by the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition. The State of Texas has already raised approximately $9,000,000. The legislature appropriated $3,000,000, and the city of Dallas raised $6,000,000. We are asking the Federal Government to cooperate in this great exposition to commemorate the historic period of the State of Texas to the extent of an authorization of $3,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a local matter, because the heroic fathers who established the Republic of Texas came from practically every State in the Union. It is therefore a national matter; and as such, we come to the House asking its cooperation.

There is not in the State of Texas or in the House of Representatives a man more familiar with the history of Texas than my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], nor is there a spokesman so ideal and so fitting for this particular occasion than he. [Applause.] I therefore yield to my very dear friend and our most distinguished colleague [Mr. LANHAM] such time as he may require. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the rule now before us makes in order a measure to provide for Federal participation in a celebration in which every American may justly take pride. Accordingly, that participation should be adequate to effectuate the purposes which inspire it. The exposition to be held in Texas is not an ordinary one; it is distinctly unique. In the history of our country there has been no celebration similar or analogous to it. It marks the observance of the centennial anniversary of a successful American struggle for independence. It commemorates the formation of a republic which was subsequently and amicably absorbed by another republic. Indeed, I doubt if there can be found a counterpart of the history which prompts our present contemplation.

Unless you are familiar with various features of that history and its consequences, you cannot understand the considerations which urge the adoption of this authorization for an appropriation of $3,000,000. The time at my disposal is too brief for their thorough discussion, but I wish as tersely as I may to bring to your attention four phases of this proposal:

In the first place, I would impress upon you that the history to be celebrated is in no way provincial. It is definitely and comprehensively American. Secondly, I would acquaint you with the important significance of that history to the United States in the acquisition and development of practically one-third of its territory. [Applause.] I would show you, in the third place, what the State of Texas has done and is doing to make this centennial celebration a success, and, fourthly, some of the ways in which the Federal Government may appropriately participate.

In the early part of the last century Moses Austin, a Connecticut Yankee, an outstanding American with a vision of the possibilities of our new Nation, conceived the idea of an American colony in Texas, then a vast area under the domination and control of Mexico. Because of the handicaps he encountered and the hardships he endured in that undeveloped empire, he passed away before his work was completed. It remained for his son, Stephen F. Austin, under difficulties insurmountable to a spirit less intrepid, to carry on the enterprise successfully and to become by popular acclaim "the father of Texas."

The families that constituted that first colony came from various States of the American Union as that Union then existed. Subsequent colonies were of similar American origin. These rugged pioneers were not mere adventurers. Some of them had served in the Congress of the United States. Some had occupied high judicial and professional positions. They were broad-minded Americans, typical of the best character of their respective sections, carrying with them to their new home American principles and American ideals.

Their lot became a hard one, but time has sweetened for our country the uses of their adversity. Indignities were heaped upon them. They were harassed by the Mexican Government very much as the Thirteen Original Colonies had suffered at the hands of the mother country. Though the odds against them seemed overwhelming, they declared boldly their independence of Mexico. Nothing could daunt the spirit of such sturdy patriots. Of the 24 States then in the American Union 17 were represented among the signers of that declaration: Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois, Missouri, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Florida, Arkansas, and Mississippi.

Time does not permit me to recite in detail the valorous deeds which led to the establishment of the independence these brave Americans had declared, but I know you will pardon the mention of one or two glorious examples. You have all heard, but perhaps do not recognize as your own hallowed heritage, the story of the Alamo. That sacred shrine was held by less than 200 men under the command of William Barrett Travis, of Alabama. They were not native Texans. Most of the native Texans of those days were Indians and Mexicans. They were Americans from your States, your illustrious forefathers. They were surrounded by the overwhelming forces of the enemy. While there was still opportunity to get a message through the lines, Travis sent forth a letter. It was addressed to all Americans in the world, for these beleaguered heroes were Americans fighting in the cause of liberty. These are the words of that immortal message; hear them and see if you can surpass them anywhere in the treasured annals of any land, these stirring words sent from this scene of martyrdom to your people:

Fellow citizens and compatriots, I am besieged by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Anna. I have sustained a continual bombardment and cannonade for 24 hours and have not lost a man. The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion, otherwise the garrison are to be put to the sword if the fort is taken. I have answered the demand with a cannon shot, and our flag still waves proudly from the walls.

[Applause.]

I shall never surrender or retreat.

Then I call on you in the name of liberty, of patriotism, and everything dear to the American character to come to our aid with all dispatch. The enemy is receiving reinforcements daily and will no doubt increase the three or four thousand in 4 or 5 days. If this call is neglected, I am determined to sustain myself as long as possible and die like a soldier who never forgets what is due to his own honor and that of his country. Victory or death.

[Applause.]

And within the walls of that Alamo every one of that heroic band attested the sincerity of those words with his life's blood. They were Americans all, Americans worthy of the name; Americans who came from your country; Americans like David Crockett, of Tennessee, who with his rifle, "Old Betsy", which had been given him by the Young Men's Club of Philadelphia, took abundant toll from the enemy [applause]; Americans like James Bowie, of Georgia, originator of the famous Bowie knife. [Applause.] Would that I had time to name them all and tell you whence they came! Would that I had time to speak of Goliad, where another massacre occurred through the perfidy which marked the campaign of Santa Anna, that self-styled "Napoleon of the West"; or of old Ben Milam, of Kentucky, who in the early stages of the conflict shouted the challenge: "Who will go with old Ben Milam into San Antonio?"

Within 2 months after the fall of the Alamo a small but unyielding band of American patriots faced at San Jacinto the oncoming hordes of the foe. With the opposing armies in position, "Deaf" Smith announced that he had cut down the bridge which could serve as the enemy's only source of retreat. That was to be the finishing fight in this struggle for American independence. There on the 21st day of April 1836 these soldiers of freedom from all our States, unmindful of the fearful odds against them, rushed forth shouting the slogan which inspired them, "Remember the Alamo! Remember Goliad!" They were led by the immortal Sam Houston, that distinguished son of the Old Dominion, whose career is without a parallel in history. The superior numbers of the enemy were of no avail. Those stalwart Americans under Houston could not be vanquished. Their success was phenomenal, but their victory complete. The Alamo and Goliad had been avenged and in our beloved America a new republic was born.

It is said that, with his cherished dream of an empire in the great Southwest, this startling triumph led the dejected Aaron Burr to exclaim, "I was 30 years too soon!"

It has been truly said, "Thermopylae had its messenger of defeat; the Alamo had none." [Applause.] In a similar way some day a coiner of epigrams may suitably and tersely epitomize the battle of San Jacinto, but its significance to America seems to transcend the power of words.

And so in 1836 this continent of ours boasted another American Republic. It had its flag, its Constitution, its Congress. For 9 years it survived with a history in keeping with its glorious origin. It was recognized by four foreign governments; and the old French Embassy, constructed largely of materials brought from France, still stands in the capital city. Who was its first President? David G. Burnet, of New Jersey. Who was its last President? Anson Jones, of Massachusetts, who, in my opinion, was more responsible than any other American for the admission of Texas into the Union. Another of our great Presidents was Mirabeau B. Lamar, of Georgia, the founder of our system of education. The lack of proper educational opportunities had been one of the dominant causes of the revolt against Mexico. For our system in Texas, Mirabeau B. Lamar gave a slogan which I think all men might well bear in mind:

Cultivated mind is the guardian genius of democracy. It is the only dictator that free men acknowledge and the only security that free men desire.

[Applause.]

I must hurry on, but again I would remind you that men of such stamp and caliber, coming from your States, were responsible for this wonderful history. There is so much that could be told. Why, at the Battle of San Jacinto the pieces of artillery upon which these unconquerable Americans relied were two cannon, called "The Twin Sisters", which had been contributed to the cause by the citizens of Cincinnati. [Applause.] Every section of our Nation shares with glory and honor in the outstanding accomplishment which we Americans would celebrate.

Now, what has been the result of this history—and if you will read it you will find it as glorious as any that has been recorded, and it is yours, peculiarly yours?

With the admission of Texas into the American Union 389,166 square miles were added to the domain of Old Glory, and this territory included parts of five other States as they now exist: Louisiana, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Colorado.

The Mexican Government did not officially recognize the independence of Texas, which had been wrested from Santa Anna, the dictator, and it served notice upon the United States of America that the admission of this new republic as a State would be regarded as a cause of war. The boundaries were not definitely fixed and the disputes which arose from this controversy led to the War with Mexico. Out of that conflict, attributable directly to that struggle for independence on the soil of Texas, our country brought within its borders the States of California, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, and parts of Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico.

If you will look upon this map you will see outlined in blue that portion of our country which was acquired directly and immediately as the result of the Texan victory; and if you will look upon this vast expanse of western territory, here also enclosed in blue, you will find the other States I have enumerated which are now proudly American because of the service your fathers rendered in Texas in a gallant fight for freedom. In other words, the land added to the United States, land now rich in men and material, by the patriotic heroism of Americans in Texas, is greater in area than that acquired by the terms of the Louisiana Purchase. But there is a more important and significant difference than mere size. There could never attach to an acquisition by barter and sale the scintillating glory in which we bask because of the fact that they who have given us our birthright shed their blood in wresting from tyranny the right of Americans in one-third of our territory to live under our free institutions. [Applause.]

Now, in 1903 an exposition was held in St. Louis commemorative of the centennial anniversary of the Louisiana Purchase, and I think you will find that the Federal Government appropriated for that celebration more than $6,000,000. We are now asking for only one-half that sum for a centennial celebration of this glorious and peculiarly American history, based not upon the gains of purchase but upon the accomplishments of patriotic Americans from all over our land who brought us a greater gift bought by their sacrifice in preserving the teachings and traditions of American ideals.

We want you and the people of your States to become familiar with this history. We want you to know about Texas and this great western empire to which I have referred. The more we know of our country the more we love it. It is all ours. And we want the foreign governments to participate, because they, too, had a part in our origin and development. Texans can never forget the brave and liberty-loving men of Spanish blood who aided so loyally in establishing the independence of that new Republic of Texas. North, South, East, and West may feel equally at home in that beautiful Lone Star State.

Now, what has Texas done to make this celebration a success? In the first place, it was impossible for the Legislature of Texas to make an appropriation for this purpose without an amendment to our constitution. Accordingly, a constitutional amendment was submitted to authorize this expenditure and it was carried by a very substantial majority. In pursuance of that authority the legislature has appropriated $3,000,000 for this centennial celebration. During the depression Texas has suffered like other States, and I am sure you will agree readily that it has not been niggardly in doing its part to commemorate this glorious chapter of American history.

Naturally there will be celebrations at several of our shrines, but the principal exhibits are to be shown in Dallas because there we have one of the largest State fairs in the Nation, comprising 170 acres, with many permanent buildings already available for some purposes of the exposition. The value of this property has been appraised at $3,500,000. Through an issue of bonds the city of Dallas has contributed an additional $3,500,000. And then, the Central Exposition Corporation has authorized bonds in the sum of $2,500,000. I am advised that these have been sold, with the exception of $500,000, and that the entire amount will be available in 60 days. In money and land and buildings, therefore, Texas is devoting about $13,000,000 to this centennial celebration. I have no desire whatever to make any comparison in a disparaging sense, but I believe it will be found that the money and property available in advance for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, exclusive of the Federal appropriation, was not so great.

We come now to consider some of the ways in which the Federal Government may appropriately participate. It is practically impossible at this time to foresee and enumerate them all because of the comprehensive nature of the events we are to celebrate. In their various aspects they are military, naval, civil, agricultural, industrial, historical, and so forth.

The resolution provides for a Federal commission to be composed of the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture. They are able, honest, and faithful men who may be depended upon to keep the expenditures within proper bounds and to devote the funds under their supervision to purposes appropriate to the celebration. Because of the many phases of the history and development and progress involved I think they should be allowed some latitude in the exercise of their discretion.

In the first place, there will be the matter of Federal exhibits and proper building for their display. In the archives in Washington there must be many documents and other material connected with the history of that early period. Then there will be the costs of administration and transportation and other necessary incidental items which must arise with reference to appropriate exhibits.

Let me remind you that Texas is the only State in the Union that ever had a navy. This was during the war for independence and the days of the Republic. So effective was that navy that in that epochal conflict neither Mexican soldiers nor supplies were ever landed on our shores along the extensive coast of the Gulf. When the Republic was admitted into the Union the navy came with it. It seems, therefore, that it would be most appropriate to have during the centennial some proper naval display at ports of the Texas coast.

No exposition in this country has ever fittingly shown the story of cotton. In the ramifications of the industry cotton has produced, every part of our land has an abiding interest. In the southwestern section where the fleecy staple abounds, the Department of Agriculture may well exemplify every phase of the growth, cultivation, harvesting, manufacturing, and marketing of this basic commodity and demonstrate the possibilities of improvement from each of these important angles.

Similar considerations urge attention to the livestock industry in which the West and Southwest are so peculiarly interested. In my home city of Fort Worth is held annually the Southwestern Exposition and Fat Stock Show, with much equipment and many facilities available to promote progress in this industry which plays so large a part both in our subsistence and our trade.

At San Antonio, the city of the Alamo, is one of our largest military posts. Some appropriate military celebration may be devised in honor of the sacred shrine that city boasts, and Goliad and San Jacinto may well call for similar commemoration of our martial history.

In no exposition have the colored people of our country had an opportunity to show the development of their race and the contributions they have made to America. Within a radius of 600 miles of the exposition live 4,500,000 negroes. They have had much to do with many phases of southern industry and agriculture. Those in control are arranging a building for their exhibits, the plans of which have been designed by Negro architects, and the interest of the colored people is manifested by the fact that they have underwritten a part of the expense of this undertaking. There will be an appropriate hall for the concerts of their choral societies and other artists. If you have never heard their singing, you have a treat in store for you. With reference to the exhibits and other features of this phase of the celebration the Federal Government could appropriately find ways to participate.

In the field of educational exhibits the national government could be most helpful in teaching the people of our country the wonderful history to which I have alluded. Americans fought in Texas that their children might have educational advantages, and their further solicitude for the women and children of our land is exemplified in the fact that Texas gave to the Nation its first homestead law, affording a protection and security upon which the prosperity and happiness of our people must always depend. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I could talk at great length. I have not had time to deal with the mechanical arts or the various elements of progress and development since the establishment of Texan independence or of the many commercial advantages which may come to all the people from the celebrations planned. I have sought briefly to call attention to four considerations: First, that this is an American exposition and that there has never been anything like it in the history of our country. Secondly, that in its consequences it has brought to the United States, through the struggles and sufferings of free Americans who loved our institutions, more territory than was acquired by the Louisiana Purchase. Thirdly, I have tried to show that the State of Texas is seeking to do its full part in a proper commemoration of the history which is our mutual heritage.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. SWEENEY. The gentleman, in my opinion, is making a very fine historical speech. The gentleman has made reference to the amount of money the State of Texas is going to contribute. How much money will the State of Texas get from the Public Works Administration fund, and how much of that financial obligation will they assume?

Mr. LANHAM. It will get no more than its proper allotment from that fund. I do not know how that can affect the purpose of this celebration. If it is to take men off the relief rolls and give them employment, and if it has that effect and some of the money should be used in the exposition——

Mr. SWEENEY. I make the observation because I believe in times like these there are many more practical ways of spending money than for a sentimental purpose.

Mr. LANHAM. Oh, I think one trouble with us is that we have not been given, as we should have been given, to this thing of sentiment. [Applause.] Let us remember the sources from which we sprang. Let us remember the fathers who by their patriotism have made us great. Let us remember the many battles they won and strive to be worthy successors of them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I can join with my distinguished and worthy friend from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] in glorifying the deeds of those who founded the Texas Republic. It is true, Texas has contributed some of the most colorful pages in American history. No one would deny credit to anyone who was responsible for the founding of Texas, but we are not here today to measure in dollars our patriotism or sentiment. I am not opposing the rule which will bring this resolution before the House. I am not opposing legislation that provides a contribution on the part of the National Government to this great celebration to be held in the Lone Star State next year. I believe the Government should contribute toward that exposition, but in the interest of the taxpayer, in the interest of the American people who must pay these bills, I think Congress must consider well the amount we appropriate. How much are we going to give for this exposition? I assumed an obligation when the Speaker appointed me a year ago as a member of the Texas commission, and also as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which considered this bill; this obligation requires me to make a report to Congress. At no time has it come under my observation when any figures have been presented which would merit an appropriation of $3,000,000.

It is true, in these extravagant days this appropriation may be car-fare money, but it is not going to be car-fare money to the American people as the days go by; when we are obliged to renew nuisance taxes; when we are obliged to place new tax burdens on the American people. Waiving aside sentiment, I believe when anyone comes to Congress and asks for $3,000,000 they ought to show where that money is going to be expended. What will the Government get? What form will the Government's contribution be? No one knows. No one even knows in what city in Texas the money will be spent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. My friend realizes that this is an authorization bill and that the Committee on Appropriations, when it makes the appropriation, will go into a hearing with reference to what these various items should be.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That is an easy road to ruin. You come here and say this is only an authorization, and we pass it easily. Then a little later you come and say Congress has authorized this amount, and the Appropriations Committee should appropriate the amount of money stipulated. I, too, want to protect those two valiant men from Texas on the Appropriations Committee. I do not want to place the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] in the unfortunate position of being obliged to curtail the appropriation for his own State. [Laughter and applause.] I do not want to make it embarrassing for that other great watchdog of the Treasury, Mr. BLANTON, to be obliged to say that Texas cannot have this amount of money. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman realizes that my distinguished friend, the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. TABER, of New York, is another one of those watchdogs?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes; but unfortunately he is in the minority and his way will not prevail.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman mentioned the great watchdog of the Treasury, Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that when the San Diego Exposition bill was being considered the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said that $100,000 was enough for any exposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I will say for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that he is a good watchdog and he is performing a great service. He is doing well. I expect his strong voice will yet ring out here in support of my proposal that the amount be reduced.

I am a little more liberal than most of the Members on this side and perhaps some on the other side. I would give a million and a half. That is very liberal. Seriously, I say in perfectly good spirit, San Diego came here a while ago and asked for Federal recognition for its exposition. They had appropriated and raised $12,000,000. We gave them, I think, $350,000. I correct myself. We did not give $350,000. We appropriated that amount for a Government exhibit. That is a vast difference. We did not give California a single nickel.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. That is the same thing they are asking for here.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We do not know it.

Mr. BLOOM. Well, the gentleman does know it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No; there is no evidence to show it.

Mr. BLOOM. But the resolution calls for that. This is for a Government exhibit.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And that is all it says. There is nothing mandatory about appropriating it for a Government exhibit. Will the gentleman accept an amendment prohibiting that anything be spent except for a Government exhibit?

Mr. BLOOM. As far as I am concerned, it is not my resolution, but that is what this resolution calls for.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not yield further, because there is nothing in the resolution which says it will only be spent for an exhibit. Permit me to continue. There was a world's fair out in Chicago. I see the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. SABATH] is interested. The best that Mr. SABATH could get was $1,000,000. When he came back the next year he had difficulty in getting an additional $250,000.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. SABATH. Now, the gentleman knows that the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated many times to our committee that he is not bound by any amount that is authorized.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And I admire him for making that statement.

Mr. SABATH. As I have the utmost confidence in the gentleman from Texas, that he will not vote out any more than is absolutely necessary, especially in this case, I know he will hold it down to the very last penny.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How does the gentleman know it?

Mr. SABATH. Of course, we all have the utmost confidence in the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. He will see that not any more is appropriated than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman is aware of the fact that to celebrate the Louisiana Purchase the Federal Government contributed more than $6,000,000?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Two wrongs do not make a right. That was 30 years ago. Perhaps money was easier in those days. Perhaps there was not in evidence then the great threat of heavy taxation in the immediate future. That must be considered when we make appropriations at the present time.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Section 7 of this resolution authorizes an appropriation of $3,000,000 and authorizes the commissioners to expend this money, to use that money and any other money subsequently authorized or appropriated or to make any expenditure or allotment deemed necessary by it to fulfill properly the purposes of this joint resolution, and to allocate such sums to the Texas Centennial Commission and the Texas Centennial Central Exposition for expenditure by such bodies in any part of the State of Texas as the commission deems necessary and proper in carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution. So there is nothing there about Government exhibits at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The resolution is so wide open you could drive a pair of Texas steers right through it.

Mr. KLEBERG. I listened with some interest to the repetition of the history of Texas, which history, of course, I, too, know; and I was interested a moment ago when the gentleman from Massachusetts suggested an amendment limiting the expenditure of Federal funds only to a Federal exhibit at the exposition. I am wondering if the gentleman cannot find in his heart a sufficient Americanism to recognize that were $3,000,000 expended in the erection of monuments alone to keep alive the worship of the heroes who gave this country to us, the spending would not be for a better purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I can appreciate the splendid spirit prompting the gentleman's statement, but we are fast getting into the era when we cannot afford a champagne appetite. The erection of monuments and beautiful buildings is not justified unless it puts people to work; this is especially true at a time when people are hungry and when we are going to be called upon continually to spend millions and even billions of dollars for the relief of the American people. We must conserve carefully our resources.

Mr. Speaker, I am not opposing the rule. I hope the rule will be adopted, but I do hope when we go into the Committee and consider this legislation we will give the taxpayers "a break" for once this year.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 131, providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 131, with Mr. GILLETTE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the Senate joint resolution was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 1 hour and the gentlewoman from Massachusetts is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, does the other side desire any general discussion of the bill?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; Members on this side wish to be heard.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I hardly thought it was necessary to have further discussion, but Members on the other side seem to want it. I think the gentleman from Texas has fully presented the matter. The report of the committee was practically unanimous.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that there is an exceptional difference between the exposition and some others that have been held. As has been said, the city of Houston and the State of Texas are raising some $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 for the exposition. It is not a State exposition but is really a part of the history of the great West.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I was impressed with the concluding remarks of my friend and distinguished colleague [Mr. LANHAM] in answer to the question whether this was not too much money to be spent for sentiment. I believe the trouble with our country at this time and for some years has been that we have grown so cynical and have been so actuated by the spirit of sordid commercialism that we have lost sight of the spirit of idealism and patriotism which actuated our fathers.

Mr. Chairman, this is not to be a commercial exposition; this is not an exposition prompted by an organization in some city or town in order to seek notoriety for their town or to bring business to that section. The celebration which will begin in June of 1936 commemorates the one hundredth anniversary of the independence of Texas. It is not commercial but historic, and is to commemorate the heroic and successful struggle of a small band of patriots against an enemy vastly superior in numbers. The idea of this celebration did not originate in Texas. The first suggestion that we have this celebration in 1936 came from a distinguished citizen of the State of New York—Mr. Theodore H. Price—who happened to be visiting in Texas. Being familiar with the history of our great State, he suggested in a speech he made there some 10 years ago that in 1936 we have a centennial exposition commemorating the birth of Texas. In response to the suggestion of this gentleman from New York, our people 10 years ago began to dream dreams of this great exposition. For the past 10 years there has been activity among the various citizens of Texas in organizing for the celebration of this great event. Until 2 years ago the constitution of our State did not permit the State to make contributions of this kind.

Two years ago, however, the legislature submitted to the people of Texas for their vote the question of whether or not the constitution of the State should be so amended as to authorize the legislature to make this appropriation; and the people of Texas by a popular vote adopted the amendment and an appropriation of $3,000,000 was made by the legislature for this centennial. I mention this that you may know it is not a small group who favor this exposition but that it is sponsored by the people of the entire State, who at the polls registered their willingness to tax themselves even in these hard times to have this exposition. The city and citizens of Dallas, as already pointed out, have also made liberal appropriations. So this celebration is not in response to a sudden impulse of a few but has been planned for years and has the endorsement of our entire State.

Mr. Chairman, we shall celebrate next year an event by which the United States secured 30½ percent of the present domain of the entire continental United States, taking into consideration the territory that came into Texas under the annexation and that which came as a result of the annexation of Texas and the war that followed in making effective the annexation.

When Texas was admitted into the Union under a resolution adopted by this Congress, the Mexican Government gave notice to our Government that if the treaty annexation was adopted by the Congress that would be tantamount to a declaration of war. The Congress of the United States in 1845 passed the resolution of annexation, and, as a result, the Mexican Government immediately recalled their Minister from Washington and severed all diplomatic relations with the United States. They began to make contentions about where the boundary line was, claiming that the boundary line should not be the Rio Grande but should be the Nueces River. As a result, war followed, and in that war Texas participated and the citizens of other States participated. There was annexed, because of this war, that vast territory which was shown on the map exhibited by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. The territory which came to this country through the annexation of Texas and cession from Mexico as a result of the War with Mexico, caused by the annexation of Texas, comprises 30½ percent of the present entire domain of the continental United States, and is larger than the entire United States in 1790.

Mr. Chairman, I have here some figures prepared from the Statistical Abstract, which gives the territorial expansion of the United States. In 1790 the territory of the United States comprised 892,135 square miles. The Louisiana Purchase in 1803 was 827,987 square miles. The acquisition of Florida in 1819 was 58,666 square miles. The annexation by the treaty with Spain in 1819 was 13,435 square miles. The annexation of Texas in 1845 was 389,166 square miles. The Oregon annexation in 1846 was 286,541 square miles. The Mexican cession in 1848 was 529,189 square miles. The Gadsden Purchase in 1853 was 29,670 square miles; making a total area of the continental United States 3,026,789 square miles.

Adding the area of Texas acquired by annexation with that ceded by Mexico increased our domain 918,355 square miles. Is not the celebration of an event which resulted in the acquisition of one-third of the domain of the United States worthy of recognition by the Federal Government?

Mr. Chairman, no State in the Union can have a celebration which will commemorate the acquisition of territory which amounted to nearly one-third of the entire domain of the United States. No other State in the American Union can have a celebration where it celebrates the annexation of a republic. When this resolution was heard by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House we had a most interesting and instructive hearing. At the conclusion of that hearing the motion to report this resolution did not come from the Democratic members of that committee but came from gentlemen on the other side, namely, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. It was so reported. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], who has made some observations here in opposing the resolution, was not at the hearing, and I believe if he had been present and had heard the testimony in reference to the resolution he would have been heartily in favor of it, as the other members of the committee are who were there and heard the testimony at that time.

The people who founded Texas were not marauders. They were not buccaneers. They were men; they were brave men.

They were not only brave men, but among them were those who had held high positions in other States before their migration to Texas. Richard Ellis, the president of the constitutional convention, was a former associate justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama. George Campbell Childress, the author of the Texas declaration of independence, was a brilliant lawyer from Nashville, Tenn. A. H. Latimer was an able lawyer and a near relative of Hon. Henry Latimer, once United States Senator from Delaware. Sam Houston, the commander in chief of the Texas revolutionary forces, and afterward President of the Texas Republic, served in the Congress of the United States from Tennessee, and was once Governor of that great State. David Crockett, one of the martyrs of the Alamo, served in Congress from Tennessee. Samuel P. Carson, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, served for 8 years in the Congress of the United States from North Carolina, as did Robert Potter, also from North Carolina. Thomas J. Rusk studied law in the office of John C. Calhoun, in South Carolina, and was afterward chief justice of the Texas Supreme Court and later United States Senator from Texas. David G. Burnet, president ad interim of the Republic of Texas, was born in Newark, N. J., and his brother, Jacob Burnet, was a member of the Supreme Court of Ohio and afterward United States Senator from Ohio, and another brother was mayor of Cincinnati.

Moses Austin, one of the earliest pioneers, was from Connecticut, and his son and successor was Stephen F. Austin, born in Virginia, and whose statue and that of Sam Houston may now be seen in Statuary Hall of this Capitol. Anson Jones, the last President of the Republic of Texas, and whose efforts were largely instrumental in the annexation of Texas by the United States, was born in Great Barrington, Mass.

May I say that the constitutional convention met in the town of Washington on the Brazos, near the home of our friend the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. BUCHANAN.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this celebration is not alone ours. We want the people of the United States. We want the people in all the States to know that they had a part in this great chapter of the most colorful history in all the world. We want them to come to the State where that history was made and rejoice with us that the heroic sacrifices of their fathers made possible the empire of the great Southwest.

We want the people to know that the time has not come when we are willing to vote money only for commercialism. They talk about unemployment; this money will be spent to put people to work. The money to be expended under this resolution will give people jobs just as much as a great deal of the other legislation we have passed, and this money is not going to be turned over directly to Texas or to State officials down there, but will be expended under the direction of the members of a Federal commission, as provided in the resolution.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. How does the gentleman know what this commission is going to do with the money? The gentleman says they are not going to turn it over to the people down there, but as the gentleman from New Jersey pointed out a few minutes ago, they have the authority to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Of course, here is what will be done: This money will be expended by a Federal commission, and this commission is composed of the Vice President, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of Agriculture. These four men represent the Federal Government in expending this money.

Mr. CARTER. Under this bill they have authority to allocate such sums as they desire to the Texas Centennial Commission.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; the commission will have that authority.

Mr. CARTER. Would the gentleman subscribe to an amendment that would limit this committee in the expenditure of this money to the establishment of an exhibit of the United States Government there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that is the purpose for which the money would be expended, and let me say to the gentleman, I am going to offer an amendment, which has been suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], and under this amendment we expect to establish in the city of Austin a museum to preserve the historic relics of Texas, and there is to be an appropriation for that purpose. This celebration is going to be State-wide, and while the main exposition is to be held in Dallas, there will be celebrations throughout the State. There will be a celebration at San Antonio, at the Alamo, where these men gave their lives in defense of liberty. There will be one at Houston near the battlefield of San Jacinto.

Mr. CARTER. I have no objection to the United States Government going, perhaps, into several cities and putting up a proper exhibit——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is the reason we cannot restrict or limit the language.

Mr. CARTER. But your bill goes much further than that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. To what portion of the bill does the gentleman refer?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CARTER. Page 6, line 4, the language provides that this commission consisting of four members, as the gentleman has enumerated, may allocate these funds to other commissions, and this money certainly would not be used to ones that will hold the celebrations throughout the State

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I may say to the gentleman that the Federal commission can provide any such limitation as they want or think proper. These organizations are the ones that will hold the celebrations throughout the States and the Federal commission that will allocate this money. We may assume they will exercise this right in the interest of the Federal Government to make these allocations in an appropriate manner, so that the expenditures will be in harmony with the interests of the Federal Government and provide for an exhibit by the Federal Government itself.

Mr. CARTER. It is not my point that the expenditures will not be in harmony with the interests of the Federal Government. I think they should be expended for a Federal exhibit. This was the limitation put in the last bill of this kind that passed this House, and I think it is a very proper limitation.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. The provision referred to allocates such sums for expenditure by such bodies in any part of the State of Texas as the commission deems necessary and proper in carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution and the joint resolution provides for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and the celebrations to be held in the State of Texas. So under this language the money is only to be spent for the purposes of this joint resolution.

Mr. CARTER. The joint resolution covers the entire purpose of this commission, of course.

I do not want to take the gentleman's time unduly, but there is one other question I should like to ask.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. I notice on page 3 the resolution provides for the appointment of a commissioner and one or more assistant commissioners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I may say to the gentleman that we have a committee amendment limiting that to not more than three assistants.

Mr. CARTER. I think that is a very commendable amendment.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be enough public-spirited gentlemen in the State of Texas who would contribute their services to this great cause instead of having four positions of this kind, one at $10,000 and three at $7,500?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. One or more of these men will probably be sent down there from Washington, and I do not know that Texas people will get all of these jobs, because there has to be one or more who are experienced in work of this kind.

Mr. MILLARD. They are to be appointed by the President?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; the commissioner general is so appointed and he selects his assistants.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. THURSTON. I am very much in sympathy with the purposes of this resolution. It is entirely fitting that our Government should recognize the annexation of the Republic of Texas, but would the gentleman be willing to reduce the appropriation from $3,000,000 to $2,000,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let me say in reply to the gentleman that I think the Appropriations Committee, of which the gentleman is a member, will do that if they think it is necessary. The gentleman knows how jealously they guard appropriations, and while some comment was made about the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee being from Texas, I think those who know the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. BUCHANAN], all realize that he is so conscientious with the Government's money that he would not let that sway him in any way.

In fact, as one gentleman said, speaking of Mr. BUCHANAN—someone asked if he thought he could get an appropriation, and the reply was, to use his own language, "Old Buck is pretty stingy with the Government's money." [Laughter.]

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. May I call this to the attention of my colleague, that because of the great ramifications of Texas history—military, naval, civil, industrial, agricultural, representatives from foreign governments—it is perhaps impossible in advance to know every little item of expense that may arise, but that the commission may be depended upon not to make allocations not in accordance with the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think so. I think the commission can be trusted to exercise its sound judgment.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. I have been very much interested in this matter, and I want to ask the gentleman how much has been appropriated by the Federal Government for former expositions?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not that data before me, but for Chicago there was a million and a half. They had two expositions, and I think the money appropriated for both exceeds the amount asked for here. You must remember that we have had no celebration of this character. As my colleague has said, this is a patriotic event. The Louisiana Purchase was celebrated in 1903, and represented the acquisition of that territory; that was a barter and sale. This is a celebration of the acquisition of territory that was won by the blood and sacrifice of American citizens. I think there is quite a difference.

Mr. REILLY. What was the amount appropriated for the San Francisco exhibition?

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. They have had several exhibitions. Let me say that I attended the exhibitions at San Francisco and San Diego, and I have enjoyed them all. There would have been no exhibition in any place if it had not been for this western territory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let me say that the acquisition of Texas made it possible for California to be a State.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. Instead of scattering this exhibition about the State of Texas, why not have it held in Los Angeles? [Laughter.]

Mr. LANHAM. Let me say that Texas was a republic for 9 years before the acquisition of California, and California became a republic for only 9 days.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to authorize the appropriation of $3,000,000 to celebrate the achievements of the men who fought to free the land now comprised within the State of Texas from the Empire of Mexico and later made it one of the United States.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who spoke at some length in favor of the rule, and the gentleman who just closed, if my understanding of their remarks be correct, and we all agree with what they had to say, praised the deeds of the liberty-loving souls, the determination and the steadfastness of certain "rugged individuals" who so brought Texas into the Union. Listening to them, we did not hear anything about any "planned government" which accomplished that great feat. The reason is clear. Their achievements were those of individuals, not of a group which crushed initiative, which frowned upon, and sought to prohibit the progress of the individual, not of a planned government which knew neither patriotism nor kindliness, but, in reality, only the advancement of the planners, which, under the guise of sympathy for the downtrodden or the average man, in the end, reduced him to a condition of servitude.

It is well that we remember their acts, that we emulate the spirit which inspired them, that to our respective States we render the loyal protection of local self-government for which they fought and died. Much has been, more will be, said in praise of the spirit which moved them, of the sacrifices which they made, of the great material good which has come to us through their acts.

If gentlemen are really asking for this appropriation of the taxpayers' money for the purpose of causing us to remember the principles which motivated these patriots to whom they so fittingly refer, to follow in their footsteps and to battle for our rights as individuals and as local governments entitled to govern themselves, it might be well to remember that the last Congress, and this Congress to almost as great an extent, has surrendered the rights so dearly won, to the executive branch of our Government; that we this session have time and again shown ourselves to be false to the principles for which those whom you now praise so highly, whom you love for their great deeds, gave their efforts; to remember that we, day after day, as a body, shirk the responsibility put upon us and that we are, through legislation, granting to a small group the powers sought to be exercised by the ruler of Mexico, whose yoke these men would not carry.

From the majority side and especially by the gentleman from Texas, that great statesman who so frequently reminds us of our duty to economize, who does not seem to be here at present, during this session, day following day and week after week, we on the Republican side have been reminded that the President received from the people, in the election of 1932, a mandate to carry out certain policies; that mandate had been confirmed in 1934.

We, as Republicans, have not forgotten the platform, the campaign promises, of the Democratic Party, of its candidate for the presidency. We recall that those promises have not been fulfilled. We are told from day to day that it was, and is, our patriotic duty to support the administration in all things. Time and again we have seen Members on the majority side whipped into line by bitter denunciation of their attempts to voice their individual convictions, to vote in accordance with their judgment. We have noted, not with surprise, but with sorrow, the scorching party lash which has beaten into subjection the would-be independent individual members of a great party. We realize that they are still hypnotized by the magnitude of the popular vote received in 1932, which they, as well as certain other gentlemen, have erroneously construed as an individual tribute to their candidate, but which was, in fact, in part due to dissatisfaction with the power obtained by the so-called "vested interests", in part to the shameful "smearing" of the Nation's then President, but to a far greater extent, to the fact that, prior to that campaign, party platforms, campaign promises, were, by the people, construed to be declarations of principle, a pledging of service in accordance with those declarations. To the fact that the voters believed, relied upon, that platform, those promises.

Misconstruing the causes of that victory, the party has betrayed those who gave it their support, and today we have, not a Democratic Party but a party of so-called "new dealers", an entirely different thing.

We on this side well know that you of the Democratic Party will, on every occasion, whenever you have an opportunity so to do, if you follow your course in the last and, so far, in this Congress, with but one exception, vote for the must measures, for the bills which have the administration's endorsement. This support of the administration one might say is given almost unconsciously, surely blindly, for many, many times, upon reflection, you must realize your error, and it is only when some group desires an appropriation of public funds or an increase of political positions that you venture to make your protests audible.

To our friends on the Republican side I make the request that today you join with me in supporting this President of ours in his efforts to economize; that we call the attention of the gentlemen who desire this appropriation of $3,000,000 to the fact that they are repudiating their party platform, in that this bill will further increase expenditures above revenues.

We all know that, since 1932, many, many laws have been passed, hundreds, yes, thousands of rules and regulations have been promulgated, under the cloak of which hundreds of thousands of dollars in fees have been collected by Federal and other employees, all under the codes, all without authority of law. If the record be read correctly, practically all of the important laws so passed, all of the regulations and rules so made by bureaucrats, were passed upon the theory that a great emergency existed, that our country was in great distress, that children were starving and going naked, were cold, that the women were suffering from a lack of the necessities of life in the hamlets and the cities of our land, that men were out of jobs.

So, acting upon the thought that there actually existed a great national emergency, some of you joined with others not now here and passed all this legislation which permitted a government contrary to the principles of our Constitution, this legislation which the Supreme Court has so recently said was unconstitutional. The legislation was passed, and the oft-repeated excuse or reason for its passage, for the abdication by Congress of its power and its duty to legislate, for the shirking of a plain duty, was that it was necessary to prevent a revolution. The use of that term is no longer popular. It served its purpose. We no longer hear it. Its power of intimidation has gone. Its falsity has been demonstrated and it has been cast aside.

Beyond question, the Members of Congress voting for that legislation were sincere. Equally true is it that they were thoughtless, that the true condition of our country, the natural resourcefulness of our people, their ability to overcome adversity was given no consideration whatever, or was underestimated.

Today we are asked to celebrate what? To celebrate the deeds of a planned society, the accomplishments of a planned economy? Oh, no! We are asked to celebrate the deeds of individuals, of those gentlemen who accomplished something because of their rugged individualism, men who acknowledged no master minds, neither in Mexico nor elsewhere.

Before we celebrate, why not for the moment support the President and some of the concededly good declarations of the Democratic platform? Why not get onto the Democratic bandwagon once and help them out? Always here, when we criticize, they have asked us to offer some constructive suggestion. Today the suggestion is offered that they follow their President in some of his statements. Here is one that might be taken into consideration when we are asked to appropriate this money and know, as we do, that we are continually borrowing and creating new deficits. In July of 1932, President Roosevelt, then Governor, said:

> Let us have courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits. Stop the deficits.

Later, in October, he made this statement:

> Now the credit of the family depends chiefly on whether that family is living within its income. And this is so of the Nation. * * * If, like a spendthrift, it throws discretion to the winds, is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending, extends its taxing up to the limit of the people's power to pay, and continue to pile up deficits, it is on the road to bankruptcy.

Support your President? There are many things in which the Republicans would be only too happy to support him. The balancing of the Budget is but one. The decreasing of Federal expenditures is another. The lessening of the number of Federal officeholders is another. The creation of a sound currency, the reestablishment of confidence, and so on down the list, almost endless; but these suggestions, like the promises of your platform, of your candidates, you blithely disregard and happily go on your way, scattering the taxpayers' money broadcast over the land—no; not over the land—usually in those localities which Democratic votes can be gathered on election day.

Appropriate money to celebrate? What are we celebrating? What do you want to celebrate? Not long ago you gave the President $4,000,000,000, and for what purpose? We all know—to relieve distress, to grant unemployment insurance, to establish an old-age pension, to create jobs—all given for the announced reason, and can it be that you had another, that it was necessary, in order to relieve distress, that people might not go hungry, that families might not be disrupted, that homes might not be lost?

Is there any reason why a State should not first put its own house in order? Has Texas a law which prevents the employment of children? Has it a law which limits the hours which a woman may be required to work, the maximum hours under which men may be employed? Has it unemployment insurance? Has it an old-age-pension law down there which will match the Government's share of the money which it just appropriated under the social-security bill?

You are asking for Federal aid to assist you in doing all of these things, and before you do your part you come here with words of praise and with fine phrases and ask the rest of the country to appropriate money taken from the taxpayers to assist you in celebrating, in putting on a show, an exposition. That is all very well and great lessons may be so learned. But in times of adversity—and you have told us endless number of times that these are days of suffering and of sorrow—why celebrate something that happened years and years ago? Do you think for one moment that, if those whose deeds you are commemorating, whose examples you seek to call to mind by this appropriation, were here today that they would join you in asking for an appropriation to celebrate, or would they, as they did in those days when they lived and fought and died for humanity, direct you in no uncertain terms to use that money, your efforts, for the relieving of suffering, for the teaching of the principles of constitutional government?

Were they here, might they not ask you whether you were celebrating the fact that today we have the greatest number of unemployed in the history of our country? Might they not inquire whether you were celebrating the fact that today we have the largest public debt that the Nation ever knew, and call to your attention the fact that we are going more rapidly into debt, day by day, than the country ever went before?

When celebrating, will you call to the mind of the public this rapid increase in the debt which it must some time pay with interest? Will you mention the fact that the greatest number of experiments ever tried—some still persisted in—have proven to be failures; that today the Nation has on its pay roll the largest number of jobholders that ever existed? Are you celebrating the fact that during the last and the present sessions Congress has discarded those principles of government which existed when these men gained the independence of Texas and put her into the Union? Have you forgotten that if they were here today, in order to attain and maintain the freedom for which they fought, they would be forced to repudiate our National Government and those administering it if the policies now advocated by the advisers of the administration be adopted?

Our constructive suggestion today is that you support the President, that you avoid waste, that you economize, that you reduce Federal expenditures, cut out all needless expenditures, quit going into debt, attempt to assist in balancing the Budget, and thus indicate your belief in your party platform, redeem the promises of your Presidential candidate.

Only $3,000,000. It is not very much as national expenditures go. It may be but a drop in the bucket, but drops like these cause the overflow. You gave San Francisco a little over a million dollars; you gave Philadelphia something over two million; Chicago a little more than a million, for expositions. You of Texas are now asking for three million.

It has been reported that a Member of this House, then a party power, now since risen to a distinguished position at the other end of the Capitol and in the Nation, once said that if the North was to receive a ham, Texas would take a whole hog—perhaps not an elegant expression. Perhaps it should not be here repeated. Nevertheless, a plain, understandable illustration of what you are seeking to do, of what you do, not once in a while but very, very frequently, when you take money from the taxpayers of the North, using it for the benefit of the States which, by their lack of industry or of achievement, have failed to create like wealth subject to taxation.

To my friends on the Republican side, let me repeat: For once let us join together as one solid group and attempt to uphold the hands of the President in his effort, if he makes that effort, to cut out the waste of public money, to get the country back again where its expenditures will be no greater than its income.

Celebrate? Yes; all in due time; but let us postpone all celebration until distress has been alleviated, the condition of the farmer relieved, taxes reduced—it was just a few days ago you voted a continuation of extraordinary taxes.

Let us with national affairs do as we do with matters which affect us individually—celebrate when the victory has been won. Let your celebration in Texas wait until prosperity has returned, and we can all join with you in heartfelt sincerity. Let us deny this application for $3,000,000 to put on a show, to give an exposition, until the workingman has a job and the unfortunate are assured of at least a decent living. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY].

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, when this joint resolution came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the first time I was deeply impressed by the purpose of this exposition. We in Connecticut are celebrating the three hundredth anniversary this year. In 1635 the first settlement of that small State was made. That small State of 4,000 square miles is almost a mite compared to the 400,000 square miles of Texas.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I was wondering how much money the Federal Government gave to Connecticut for its exposition?

Mr. SHANLEY. Connecticut appropriated over $100,000 from its own State.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am talking about the Federal Government.

Mr. SHANLEY. We asked $10,000 from the United States, because it is a purely personal, local, and State celebration. It is not an exposition in any sense. We are not inviting foreign nations.

For 300 years we have been either a Commonwealth or a State. This request of the Texas Centennial Commission is a request to celebrate for an area that is probably one of the largest the world has ever seen. It is a request that is comparable to that of the Louisiana Purchase Commission. With the distinguished Members of the minority I had my doubts as to the $3,000,000 appropriation. I was not convinced until I heard comparable appropriations for other great expositions. I felt that if the State of Texas was willing to spend $9,000,000 itself, and that we had spent $6,000,000 for the celebration of the Louisiana Purchase, that $3,000,000 would be a wise and sanguine investment. I felt that Texas would utilize that $9,000,000 and the $3,000,000 to do more good for Texas and incidentally for the country than any other appropriation we have made.

I am not unmindful of the conditions all over the country. I am not unmindful that we cannot stop all efforts of this type. Will we wipe out the Connecticut celebration; will we wipe out the Texas celebration; will we wipe out the San Diego celebration simply because there are other appropriations? I believe that this appropriation of $3.000,000 will, as gentlemen who have preceded me have said, be scrutinized by the Committee on Appropriations. I believe that that money will be allocated, and that before the Appropriations Committee gets through with it, it may be less than $3,000,000. I am willing to pass this bill. I am willing to vote for it and willing to present it to the Appropriations Committee, that they, in the larger picture of this country, will be able to justify it if justification is necessary.

I am gratified to say in this three hundredth anniversary of the State of Connecticut that that little Commonwealth has given much to this Nation. We gave the first fundamental orders; the first organic constitution in the history of the world came out of Connecticut. We gave you in the South your cotton gin. We gave you Nathan Hale, and to Texas we gave Moses Austin. It is a pleasure to be able to say that that gentleman came from forbears in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman give us the date of the commencement of the manufacture of wooden nutmegs in Connecticut?

Mr. SHANLEY. I do not think we have ever given up that practice, we made so much money out of it. We ought to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL].

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there is no delegation from any State for which I have a higher regard than the delegation from Texas. They are all very fine gentlemen. They are all good American citizens. They are all here trying to do the best they can during this session for their country.

I am not rising in opposition to the amount of this appropriation with any feeling at all of unfriendliness to the great State of Texas nor to the great delegation from Texas, because I have the highest regard for both. In fact, whenever I collaborate with my Texas colleagues I am reminded of the words of that great Irish poet, Thomas Moore:

Long, long may our hearts with true friendship be filled
Like a vase in which roses have once been distilled.
You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will cling round it still.

[Applause.]

That is the way I feel about these gentlemen from Texas. But it seems to me that the amount involved in this bill is entirely too great. I sympathize with their aspirations. I know that they are all good horse traders down there and they always ask for plenty with the idea that, of course, if they have to cut it down to one-third or one-half, at least they have not lost the whole amount.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] remarked that Texas had been carved out by reason of the heroism of the men of Texas. I agree with him. They were a mighty fine group of real men and patriots in those days, as are the Texans today, and they did a fine job of it.

The gentleman says we got the Louisiana Territory by barter and trade. I know he is not complaining because we out-traded France when we got the Louisiana country by spending $15,000,000, but they are asking for one-fifth of that amount now for an exposition.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I am sorry I cannot yield; I have not the time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. EKWALL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman regarding this great territory bought by the blood of Americans from all over the country, greater than the territory acquired through the Louisiana Purchase, if the gentleman does not think we ought to be willing to spend in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of that victory half as much as we spent celebrating the anniversary of the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory?

Mr. EKWALL. What disturbs me right now is where the watchdogs of the Treasury are. Where is BLANTON? Where is MCFARLANE? I have looked in vain for these gentlemen since this resolution was brought up. Time and again I have seen these gentlemen object to meritorious bills for $100, $200, $500, and $1,000. Then they go back to their constituents, sum up the total amount, and show where they have saved millions of dollars to the taxpayers. I want to read from the RECORD a statement of our genial friend, the sage of Abilene, made when the gentleman from California had up the question of an appropriation for the San Diego fair. Here is what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said on January 21:

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] knows that this resolution authorizes an appropriation of $350,000 for an exposition at San Diego. I am not prejudiced against expositions. I think they are not only entertaining but instructive, but they are becoming very expensive. Can we not have an understanding with the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, and with those who are especially interested that we shall strike out $350,000 and limit this authorization to—to $100,000.

[Applause.]

If we could have that understanding, I would be willing to go along; but $350,000 is a sum entirely too large at this time for us to spend on the exposition in San Diego.

That is the manner in which the gentleman from Texas spoke to us at that time. The question now is why cannot the gentlemen from Texas accept a reasonable amount? Why can they not accept, say, $1,000,000? The exposition at San Diego is an international exposition. It was allowed $350,000, but the gentleman from Texas wanted to cut it down to $100,000, yet that is an international exposition. As the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN] has expressed it, they want to spread this entirely over the State of Texas, and goodness only knows how many thousand square miles there are in Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman should not charge up against Texas the statement of my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in objecting to $350,000. He should give Texas credit that I, a Texan, reported out that San Diego resolution for the full $350,000.

Mr. EKWALL. Yes; that was a mighty fine gesture.

Now, I am going to again wax poetic and read from Don Juan these lines:

'Tis sweet to hear the watchdog's honest bark
Bay deep-mouth'd welcome as we draw near home;
'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
Our coming, and look brighter when we come.

[Applause.]

Let us now be the watchdogs of the Treasury.

We are finally approaching, in this session, the time when we can see the lights of our respective towns and villages off in the immediate distance; we are going home pretty soon. Let us go home with a record of having tried to save the taxpayers some money and yet having done substantial justice to the State of Texas—not only to the State of Texas but to the entire country, for I do not speak disparagingly of the State. We honor the State of Texas; it is a great State, but do not forget that we in the State of Oregon, at Champoeg, in 1843, cast the vote which saved the entire Northwest for the United States, rather than voting it into the British Empire. So I do not yield to these gentlemen all the honor of having saved a great area of territory for the United States. But I would remind them that we must think of the interests of the people of this country many of whom are without work, without food and with little of this world's goods to sustain even life itself. It seems to me we ought to consider the taxpayers in this country a little, because we have spent billions of dollars. We should begin to economize.

I am opposed to this bill authorizing an appropriation of $3,000,000. I place great faith in the judgment of the gentlemen and gentlewomen making up this body as to the right amount to spend for this purpose. We should not simply take the recommendation of the committee or pass the buck to them. I think we ought to reduce this authorization here and now at this time to a reasonable amount, say, $1,000,000, or at the outside, $1,500,000. I think this should satisfy these gentlemen, and I believe the country would be satisfied; but for more than this I am not willing to vote.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield.

Mr. DIES. I understand the gentleman's position, but will he tell us how he voted on the $4,800,000,000 bill?

Mr. EKWALL. I will tell the gentleman how I voted, and why I did so. I voted for that bill, although I did not believe in the entire bill. I had to vote that way so that the people in my district and in the country at large could get needed relief, and the only way they could get relief was by our voting for the most tremendous sum of money the taxpayers of this country have ever been asked to pay. That is the reason I voted for that bill. I had to vote for the $4,000,000,000 appropriation in order to get food and clothing for the people of this country who were out of work and walking the streets. That is why I voted for it and I would vote for it again. However, may I say that I would rather have voted for a disintegrated bill where an independent and separate vote might have been had on the items included in the bill, so that a lot of things might have been eliminated that should not have been in the bill.

The gentleman from Texas talks about sentiment.

I cast a sentimental vote when I voted for the $4,880,000,000 works relief bill, and I did it through sentiment because I had a feeling for the poor and unfortunate people of this country, who need and must have help.

[Here the gavel feel.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL].

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I was intensely interested in the splendid talk made by the gentleman from Texas recounting the wonderful history of that State and of the Southwest. I was more interested in the remarks made by the gentlemen who gave the amount of money appropriated by various Congresses for expositions held in commemoration of various events. There was $6,000,000 appropriated to commemorate the Louisiana Purchase, $1,500,000 for the Chicago Exposition, and $1,000,000 for San Francisco, and so forth.

Mr. Chairman, Michigan is celebrating her one hundredth anniversary next year. We came down to Washington requesting something for Michigan. We did not ask for $6,000,000; we did not ask for $1,000,000; we did not ask for $200,000. We did not ask for $1! All we asked was that the Post Office Department issue a stamp commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the constitution of the State of Michigan. While this Government was willing to give $6,000,000 to Louisiana, $1,000,000 to San Francisco, $1,500,000 to Chicago, $350,000 to San Diego, and while you will undoubtedly give $3,000,000 to Texas, I want to place into the RECORD the fact that the Republican State of Michigan could not get a postage stamp from the present Democratic administration. [Applause.] Despite repeated requests by letter; despite the fact that several bills were introduced making such requests; despite the further fact that other States were granted a stamp issue commemorating a similar event, the Post Office Department refused to issue a stamp commemorating the one hundredth birthday of the greatest State in the Union—a Republican State—Michigan.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I am advised that no more time is desired on the other side, and I therefore ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes

Whereas there is to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936 an exposition and celebrations commemorating the historic period of Texas history and celebrating a century of independence and progress; and

Whereas the State of Texas, the city of Dallas, Tex., and the Texas Centennial Central Exposition, a corporation, are making $9,000,000 available for such exposition through appropriations and bond issues; and

Whereas such exposition is commemorative of a heroic and successful struggle to establish the independence of a Republic, and this accomplishment resulted from the efforts of patriotic Americans of all sections of our country and led to the acquisition of territory extending far beyond the borders of Texas; and

Whereas the Republic of Texas continued for 9 years after the establishment of its independence and prior to its admission to the Union as a State, and foreign Governments sent their diplomatic representatives to the Republic of Texas; and

Whereas such exposition and celebrations are worthy and deserving of the support and encouragement of the United States; and the United States has aided and encouraged such expositions and celebrations in the past: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized and requested, by proclamation or in such manner as he may deem proper, to invite all foreign countries and nations to such proposed exposition with a request that they participate therein.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the Clerk reading the bill, Senate Joint Resolution 131, or the amended bill from the Senate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is reading from the engrossed copy of the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. BURNHAM. Do we have copies of that bill here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I may say to the gentleman that it is identical except for the amendments set out in italics.

Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to consider the various committee amendments to the bill and not read the entire bill?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, in the first place what are the committee amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has the gentleman a copy of the House bill as amended?

Mr. TABER. I have a copy of the Senate bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The House bill is the same as the Senate bill, except in italics throughout the House bill there are various committee amendments.

Mr. TABER. Where does the first one appear?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In section 2, line 10, the words "and hereinafter referred to as the 'Commission.'" I am just trying to expedite things.

Mr. TABER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer at the appropriate place.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas wish to propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there are no amendments to be offered to this bill until section 7 is reached; I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered as read and printed in the RECORD down to and including section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The portion of the bill referred to is as follows:

SEC. 2. There is hereby established a Commission, to be known as "The United States Texas Centennial Commission" and to be composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce; which Commission shall serve without additional compensation and shall represent the United States in connection with the holding of an exposition and celebration during the observance of the Texas Centennial in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936.

SEC. 3. There is hereby created a United States Commissioner General for the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate and to receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum and one or more assistant commissioners for said Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be appointed by the Commissioner General with the approval of the Commission herein designated and to receive compensation not to exceed $7,500 per annum, respectively. The expenses of the Commissioner General and such staff as he may require shall be paid out of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this joint resolution.

SEC. 4. The Commission shall prescribe the duties of the United States Commissioner General and shall delegate such powers and functions to him as it shall deem advisable, in order that there may be exhibited at the Texas Centennial Exposition by the Government of the United States, its executive departments, independent offices and establishments such articles and materials and documents and papers as may relate to this period of our history and such as illustrate the function and administrative faculty of the Government in the advancement of industry, science, invention, agriculture, the arts, and peace, and demonstrating the nature of our institutions, particularly as regards their adaptation to the needs of the people.

SEC. 5. The Commissioner General is authorized to appoint such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as may be necessary, and to fix their salaries in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; purchase such materials, contract for such labor and other services as are necessary, and exercise such powers as are delegated to him by the Commission as hereinbefore provided, and in order to facilitate the functioning of his office may subdelegate such powers (authorized or delegated) to the Assistant Commissioner or others in the employ of or detailed to the Commission as may be deemed advisable by the Commission.

SEC. 6. The heads of the various executive departments and independent offices and establishments of the Government are authorized to cooperate with said Commissioner General in the procurement, installation, and display of exhibits, and to lend to the Texas Centennial Commission and the Texas Centennial Central Exposition, with the knowledge and consent of said Commissioner General, such articles, specimens, and exhibits which said Commissioner General shall deem to be in the interest of the United States and in keeping with the purposes of such exposition and celebrations to place with the science or other exhibits to be shown under the auspices of such Texas Centennial Commission or the Texas Centennial Central Exposition or the Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations, to contract for such labor or other services as shall be deemed necessary, and to designate officials or employees of their departments or branches to assist said Commissioner General. At the close of the exposition, or when the connection of the Government of the United States therewith ceases, said Commissioner General shall cause all such property to be returned to the respective departments and branches from which taken, and any expenses incident to the restoration, modification, and revision of such property to a condition which will permit its use at subsequent expositions and fairs, and for the continued employment of personnel necessary to close out the fiscal and other records and prepare the required reports of the participating organizations, may be paid from the appropriation authorized herein; and if the return of such property is not feasible, he may, with the consent of the department or branch from which it was taken, make such disposition thereof as he may deem advisable and account therefor.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, line 10, after the word "Commission", insert "and hereinafter referred to as the Commission."

Page 2, line 11, after the word "the" where it occurs the first time, insert "Vice President, the."

Page 3, line 8, after the word "and", strike out "one or more" and insert in lieu thereof "not to exceed three."

Page 3, line 13, after the word "the", insert "salary and."

Page 3, line 16, after the word "resolution", insert "for a period of time covering the duration of the exposition and not to exceed a 6 months' period following the closing thereof."

Page 4, line 23, after the word "lend", strike out "to the Texas Centennial Commission" and insert "to the Commission and to the Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations."

Page 5, line 19, after the word "subsequent", strike out the words "expositions and" and insert the word "expositions", and after the word "fairs", insert "and other celebrations."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The sum of $3,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and shall remain available until expended. Subject to the provisions of this joint resolution and any subsequent act appropriating the money authorized herein, the Commission is authorized to make any expenditures or allotments deemed necessary by it to fulfill properly the purposes of this joint resolution and to allocate such sums to the Texas Centennial Commission and the Texas Centennial Central Exposition for expenditure by such bodies in any part of the State of Texas as the Commission deems necessary and proper in carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution. And, subject to the provisions of this joint resolution and any subsequent act appropriating the money authorized herein, the Commission is authorized to erect such building or buildings, or other structures, and to provide for the landscaping of the site or sites thereof; to rent such space as the Commission may deem adequate to carry out effectively the provisions of this joint resolution; and to provide for the decoration of such buildings or structures, and for the proper maintenance of such buildings or structures, site and grounds during the period of the exposition. The Commission may contract with the Texas Centennial Commission and/or the Texas Centennial Central Exposition for the designing and erection of such building or buildings, structure or structures, and for the rental of such space as shall be deemed necessary and proper. The appropriation authorized under this joint resolution shall be available for the operation of the building or buildings, structure or structures, including light, heat, water, gas, janitor, and other required services; for the selection, purchase, preparation, assembling, transportation, installation, arrangement, safe-keeping, exhibition, demonstration, and return of such articles and materials as the Commission may decide shall be included in such Government exhibit and in the exhibits of the Texas Centennial Commission or the Texas Centennial Central Exposition; for the compensation of said Commissioner General, Assistant Commissioners, and other officers and employees of the Commission in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, for the payment of salaries of officers and employees of the Government employed by or detailed for duty with the Commission, and for actual traveling expenses, including travel by air, and for per diem in lieu of actual subsistence at not to exceed $6 per day: Provided, That no such Government official or employee so designated shall receive a salary in excess of the amount which he has been receiving in the department or branch where employed, plus such reasonable allowance for travel, including travel by air, and subsistence expenses as may be deemed proper by the Commissioner General; for telephone service, purchase or rental of furniture and equipment, stationery and supplies, typewriting, adding, duplicating, and computing machines, their accessories and repairs, books of reference and periodicals, uniforms, maps, reports, documents, plans, specifications, manuscripts, newspapers and all other appropriate publications, and ice and drinking water for office purposes: Provided, That payment for telephone service, rents, subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals, and other similar purposes, may be made in advance; for the purchase and hire of passenger-carrying automobiles, their maintenance, repair, and operation, for the official use of said Commissioner General and Assistant Commissioners in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as required; for printing and binding; for entertainment of distinguished visitors; and for all other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Commission to fulfill properly the purposes of this joint resolution. All purchases, expenditures, and disbursements of any moneys made available by authority of this joint resolution shall be made under the direction of the Commission: Provided, That the Commission, as hereinbefore stipulated, may delegate these powers and functions to said Commissioner General, and said Commissioner General, with the consent of the Commission, may subdelegate them: Provided further, That the Commission or its delegated representative may allot funds authorized to be appropriated herein to any executive department, independent office, or establishment of the Government with the consent of the heads thereof, for direct expenditure by such executive department, independent office, or establishment, for the purpose of defraying any expenditure which may be incurred by such executive department, independent office, or establishment in executing the duties and functions delegated by the Commission. All accounts and vouchers covering expenditures shall be approved by said Commissioner General or by such assistants as he may designate except for such allotments as may be made to the various executive departments, independent offices, and establishments for direct expenditure; but these provisions shall not be construed to waive the submission of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office for audit, or permit any obligations to be incurred in excess of the amount authorized herein: Provided, That in the construction of buildings and exhibits requiring skilled and unskilled labor, the prevailing rate of wages, as provided in the act of March 3, 1931, shall be paid.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 6, line 6, after the word "expended", insert "for the purposes of this joint resolution and any unexpended balances shall be covered back into the Treasury of the United States."

Page 6, line 14, after the word "Commission", insert the words "or the Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations."

Page 7, line 4, after the word "Commission", strike out the words "and/or" and insert the words "or the Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations or."

Page 7, line 18, after the word "Commission", insert "or the Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations."

Page 9, line 3, after the word "Commission", insert the words "without release of responsibility."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 5, line 22, after the word "of", strike out "$3,000,000" and insert "$1,500,000."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, personally I have the greatest admiration for the State of Texas and for its Representatives here. Many of them are my close friends, and I admire them very much.

I am going to picture the embarrassing situation that the Representative from Texas, the great Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will be in when it is put up to him to keep down the amount authorized in this bill. Surely you would not expect a man with a record such as he has to do anything else. Why should you embarrass him by not meeting the responsibility that is yours here and now?

It has been customary to appropriate for expositions where they are being held throughout the country a reasonable amount for Government exhibits, and to that principle I subscribe.

But since the depression begun, and practically since expositions began to be held more generally through the country, it has been customary for this Congress to keep the expense of those exhibitions down.

It is true that over 30 years ago there was an appropriation of over $5,000,000 for the Louisiana Exposition, but that, as I say, was 30 years ago. Now, in recent years the only one I can find is the exhibition at Chicago, where they appropriated $1,192,000 for 2 years' exhibition. This year we appropriated $350,000 for an exposition at San Diego, and there for that international exposition people have raised at their own expense $12,000,000—as much, practically, as you raised for this in Texas.

Why cannot you accept the amendment that I have offered? I think a million and a half dollars is a fair amount.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. How much was appropriated for the exposition at Philadelphia?

Mr. TABER. Two million dollars.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman from Michigan said they could not get an appropriation. I favored that and I favor this.

Mr. TABER. I think a million and half dollars is a fair and reasonable amount for this purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Chicago had two expositions. Does the gentleman know how much was appropriated for the first exposition at Chicago?

Mr. TABER. I have not those figures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There was an exposition at Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Mr. TABER. The San Franisco Exposition several years ago had an appropriation of $1,192,000.

Mr. BURNHAM. For the exposition at San Diego 20 years ago the Government did not contribute.

Mr. TABER. I understand that is true, but I was talking about San Francisco.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$1,500,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MICHENER: Amend the amendment by striking out "$1,500,000" in the Taber amendment and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000,000."

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this matter, no estimates have been made, no arrangements have been perfected to spend the $3,000,000. They simply come in here with a resolution, hit and miss, asking Congress for $3,000,000.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Not now. If that is the case, it seems to me that we can well economize in our recognition to the extent of allowing only $1,000,000 for this celebration. You do not know today where you are going to celebrate in Texas, you have not determined upon what you are going to do in the various cities, you have no central point where your exposition is to be held, you are simply asking Congress for $3,000,000 to be used in such celebration as you may determine upon at a later date.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman recognizes the fact that this is only an authorization.

Mr. MICHENER. That is the point. It is only an authorization.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. All these things will have to be shown before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not believe that any committee of the House should authorize the expenditure of $3,000,000 until at least it has some evidence before it as to when and where and how specifically this money is to be expended. I may be a crank on these things, but when the Chicago resolution was up, a similar resolution, I moved at that time to strike from the resolution $250,000. That amendment was agreed to by an almost unanimous vote, because they did not show that they needed that amount of money. In other words, they were permitted to cut their cloth according to the amount of cloth they had to cut, and that is what Texas should do. You are asking for $3,000,000. You hardly expect to get $3,000,000, but you are going to cut your celebration to fit the amount of money that you can get from Congress.

Much has been said here today about economy in these times. I am not going to take any more time. I respect Texas, I love Texas, I would do anything in the world for my good friend, FRITZ LANHAM, and the other Members, and they know it, but when they are wrong I do not hesitate to say I think so. If this thing were outlined, if we knew where and when and how this money is to be spent, I would vote for it, but under the conditions I cannot. I believe $1,000,000 is sufficient to permit these people to carry on a dignified and proper and a real celebration.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Let us assume that they attend this great celebration in Texas to the extent of the admissions recorded at Chicago, where 42,000,000 admissions were recorded. Assuming that you pay on an average of $1 admission, then the Federal Government would receive 10 percent of those gate receipts in taxes, so that the Federal Government would receive $4,000,000 for its contribution of $3,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. COLDEN. Does the gentleman recall at any time that Los Angeles ever received an appropriation from the Federal Government for an exposition of any kind?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I regret that it has never received any; but we would if we had such an exposition.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman favor and condone the amusement taxes and other nuisance taxes? Does the gentleman think we ought to continue to levy these nuisance taxes so that the Federal Government might be reimbursed for these appropriations?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. We just continued those nuisance taxes.

Mr. TRUAX. Not by my vote. With 22,000,000 people starving except for Government doles, with a quarter of a million farmers about to be foreclosed because of the Supreme Court decision, with 4,000,000 World War veterans denied their bonus, and with a national debt of more than $30,000,000,000, it is time that Federal authorizations and appropriations for unnecessary and extraneous projects should be stopped. I expect to vote "no" on the bill. If a motion to recommit is offered which provides for reducing the authorization from $3,000,000 to $1,500,000, I shall vote "present" on that motion, since I will not vote for either amount.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. For the next 2 years.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to take your time at this late hour in the afternoon. I very much hope that I may have your attention because this is a rather important matter. In the first place, I say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], that the plan has been determined upon in Texas, and the place where the chief celebration is to be held has been determined. It happens to be the city which I have the honor to represent. We do not have big cities in Texas. It is a pretty heavy strain upon any community to act as host for a great celebration such as this will be. The city of Dallas, where the chief part of the exposition is to be held, is a city of 300,000 people. That city is putting up in cash around $6,000,000 and giving the use of its fair grounds.

I was not surprised at what was said by one man who rose here, but there were many Members who got up here at whom I was surprised. Now, this is not a Democratic celebration. It is not a Texas celebration. Nothing like this, Mr. Chairman, has occurred in the history of this Republic from the time it began. I do not want to repeat what has been said, but we purchased Louisiana with money. There were no great centers of activity there that thrilled and charmed the souls of men. This is not a celebration of Texas. These were not Texas men who did this thing which we are to celebrate. Red-blooded men came from every section of this great Nation.

I should like to have my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] read the farewell address of Anson Jones, the last President of Texas, a great man whom Massachusetts contributed to that great republic. The words of that address ring through the pages of human history. Tell me that the people of Massachusetts are not willing to make a reasonable contribution to commemorate and celebrate the independence of that government and of that people, whose highest office was surrendered by a son of Massachusetts in order that Texas might become, by its own free will, one of the States of this Union.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In just a moment.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman asked me a question and I should like to answer it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Very well.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think if we give you a million and a half that Massachusetts and every other State in the Union will be liberally contributing.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I know you do. Anson Jones would not have thought it. He was willing to give his life for Texas. [Applause.] The gentleman will be ashamed of his speech some day. When he comes down to Texas and I entertain him, as I hope I may have the privilege to do, and he realizes what we are celebrating, he will be ashamed of the speech he made. When he goes through that great State and sees the footprints of Anson Jones, the gentleman will be ashamed of his speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Now, I can understand this situation. I can understand the temper of some Members of the House, but my little city has put up $6,000,000 to help commemorate the deeds of Anson Jones and the rest of these noble men who gave freedom to Texas and gave Texas to this Republic. My city of Dallas, that community of 300,000 people, is putting up its money to do honor to your sons, more than it can afford. I could call the roll of the States and they would all answer on this roll of fame and glory. They were not men who put up the money to buy a territory as Louisiana was bought. I have nothing to say about that, but we gave $6,000,000, I believe, to celebrate the coming in of that Territory, acquired by purchase. Texas was not got that way. Men from Louisiana helped. Men gave their blood for Texas, sacrificed their lives. They died at San Jacinto, Goliad, and the Alamo. They did not sell Texas to the Union. They bought Texas with their lives and gave it to the Union. It is not as though we located one place or could locate one where we are to celebrate. Do you mean to tell me that we are not to go to Goliad? Take the Nation to Goliad and let them see how red-blooded men were willing to serve and die for their country! Is that not worth a few dollars to this Nation now, when men are soft? Take them to the Alamo! It is worth it to this Nation to take the people of this country to that holy shrine and let them see how men died for a great principle in this hour when people are soft! [Applause.] Take them to San Jacinto, where DICK KLEBERG'S granddaddy fought! Take them where the sons of your own States did these deeds of service, or might, and of sacrifice!

When you come to look at this and study it as a practical proposition, I am candid when I say I do not know how much it will take for the Nation to make a contribution and a fair exhibition. I do not know that. You do not know it, but we do know we have to begin next year. We have two checks on that fund. We have the check of the Commission, and we have the check of the Appropriations Committee. I want to tell you "old Buck" and the rest of the members of that committee have got the nerve to do what is right. [Applause.] But we do not want any niggardly sum.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Why pass the buck to "Buck"? [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We are not passing the buck to "Buck." We are settling this matter in a tentative way at least.

I heard some of these gentlemen from California sort of mouthing about this. They should be ashamed of themselves. If it had not been for San Jacinto, if it had not been for the Alamo, if it had not been for the sacrifices of your sons in Texas, the flag of Mexico might be floating over that country now. We liberated California—not "we", but the men who were contributed by every State of this Nation did that job.

We want you to come down to Texas—not to see what Texans did but to see what the sons of your States did and give our people an opportunity to show their appreciation for your contribution. This is not ours. I am not asking for anything for Texas. This is the Nation's job, and we want $3,000,000, and we do not want any chinchy thing done about this. We want a celebration of a nation that shows itself fit to be the sons of the people who made Texas free. [Applause.] We do not want any men of this generation splitting 15 or 20 cents when it comes to commemorating the deeds of heroism of those people—the history of which makes our country great. This Nation needs to look upon the deeds of these men who held it high duty to serve.

Now, let us see if this is not a fair deal which is proposed.

Do you mean to tell me you are not willing to commemorate and celebrate this achievement? No; you will not say that. There is not a man or woman here who is fit to be here who will say that. I make that statement deliberately.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I take that back, I do not like that statement, I take it back. My community of 300,000 people is putting up $6,000,000 to commemorate this achievement of what your fathers did down there. We are putting up over $6,000,000, our 300,000 people are taxing themselves $6,000,000 to commemorate the deeds of the men who bought this territory with their lives and gave it to you.

The things and places that are holy about Texas are scattered all over the State. We do not know whether $3,000,000 will be enough or not, but we in my city put up $6,000,000 and the State put up $3,000,000. Is it too much to ask that you at least provide a maximum amount of $3,000,000 with a check on it in the first instance of the commission and in the last instance of the appropriating committee? [Applause.] That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 39, noes 86.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments, which I have already sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: Page 6, line 5, after the word "Commission", insert "the board of directors of the Texas Memorial Museum."

And on page 6, line 13, after the word "thereof", insert "to grant toward the Texas Memorial Museum such sum as may be specifically provided for that purpose by the act making the appropriation authorized by this joint resolution."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand these amendments are acceptable to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the amendments are acceptable to the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this joint resolution may have the privilege of revising and extending their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

All accounts and vouchers covering expenditures shall be approved by said Commissioner General or by such assistants as he may designate, except for such allotments as may be made to the various executive departments, independent offices, and establishments for direct expenditure; but these provisions shall not be construed to waive the submission of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office for audit, or permit any obligations to be incurred in excess of the amount authorized herein: Provided, That in the construction of buildings and——

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, we are discussing today an appropriation of money by the Congress of the United States for celebrations of the Texas centennial. No amount of money which Congress might appropriate for these celebrations could be too much, for Congress should see to it that the great history of Texas shall be emphasized as a never-failing source of inspiration for all Americans and for all time.

I shall not burden you with a long talk on the history of Texas, but I want you to realize the importance of that history in relation to the general history of the whole United States of America.

Because our Nation originated in the eastern seaboard and in the Thirteen Colonies, those Thirteen Colonies have been considered as the most important foundations of our history, and I believe that is correct. However, I submit that Texas is next in importance. While the Thirteen Colonies were being formed, the might of Spain covered all of South America and Mexico and Texas, and from Texas east to Florida, and from Texas west to California. Texas became a republic in 1836, after a bloody revolution.

Preceding the formation of the Republic of Texas, we see the might of Spain, its soldiers and priests, its martyrs and statesmen. We are prone to belittle people of other nationalities; we are prone to brag about our own greatness, and yet, while being conscious of our own greatness, we must recognize greatness in others. We should not forget the greatness of Spain and of Mexico, for those two nations are really the background of Texas.

Texas has been under six flags; let us take them in order. First, Texas was under the flag of Spain; for a brief period it was under that of France; back again it came to the flag of Spain; and then in 1821, after a revolution, came the flag of Mexico. Mexico's break with Spain is one of the most dramatic episodes in world history. The great priests and martyrs—Hidalgo and Morelos—form its beginning. The Generals Nicolas Bravo, Guadalupe Victoria, and others not quite so glorious, brought it to a conclusion. Then, over in Texas, the Anglo-Saxon population, mostly Americans, led by Stephen F. Austin, moved into the great State of Texas. Later they revolted against the Government of Mexico and set up an independent republic. This was one of the strangest and most colorful of revolutions, as I shall tell you later. Then under Gen. Sam Houston, as President, who was formerly a Member of the United States Congress, and Governor of Tennessee, Texas became a part of the United States of America. Later it seceded from the United States of America and became a part of the Confederate States; and then back again it came to the Stars and Stripes. This accounts for the six flags of Texas—no other portion of the United States has had this history.

Yes, Texas has had a colorful history—romantically colorful—colored by the blood of its martyrs, and by the brave men and women who created civilization and culture in an uncharted and dangerous wilderness.

Consider the various factors in the Texas revolution. The State had altogether not over 35,000 men, women, and children. Texas was then almost twice its present size and over this vast territory armies were assembled to revolt against a nation with a population of some 7,000,000, a disparity of 200 to 1; it is really true that there is no parallel to this in world history. And nothing in all the history of heroism and sacrifice for a real cause can exceed the Battle of the Alamo. On the 23d of February 1836, the first alarm was given of the approach of the Mexicans on the Alamo. William Barrett Travis and James Bowie were there, as were 180 other heroes. For 10 days or more these men battled a force of 2,500 Mexicans under the dictator, Santa Anna. Enthusiastic historians say 4,000 Mexicans, the Mexicans say 1,500, calmer historians estimate the 2,500 as approximately correct. But we do know that the Texans were faced by veteran soldiers, outnumbered 10 or 20 to 1, with superior equipment—in fact, the Texans had practically none, finding all but two of their cannon spiked and useless.

One of those in the Alamo was Davy Crockett, who had been a Member of the Congress of the United States from Tennessee, and who was a very famous man in his own right, long before he came to Texas. He was the originator of the famous saying, "Be sure you are right, then go ahead."

These brave men had little chance. They sent requests for help, which were never received, or if received, they were ignored, except for a small band of men from Gonzales under Bonham. To show the psychology of the time, I offer for the RECORD a letter sent by Lt. Col. William Barrett Travis, which is as follows:

COMMANDANCY OF THE ALAMO,
Bexar, February 24, 1836.

Fellow citizens and compatriots, I am besieged by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Anna. I have sustained a continued bombardment for 24 hours, and have not lost a man. The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion; otherwise the garrison is to be put to the sword if the place is taken. I have answered the summons with a cannon shot, and our flag still waves proudly from the wall. I shall never surrender or retreat. Then I call on you in the name of liberty, of patriotism, and of everything dear to the American character, to come to our aid with all dispatch. The enemy are receiving reinforcements daily, and will no doubt increase to three or four thousand in 4 or 5 days. Though this call may be neglected, I am determined to sustain myself as long as possible, and die like a soldier who forgets not what is due to his own honor and that of his country. Victory or death.

W. BARRETT TRAVIS,
Lieutenant Colonel Commanding.

P. S.—The Lord is on our side. When the enemy appeared in sight we had not 3 bushels of corn. We have since found in deserted houses 80 or 90 bushels and got into the walls 20 or 30 head of beeves.—T.

The battle concluded Sunday morning, on March 6, 1836. All of those who were in the Alamo were killed, with the exception of Mrs. Dickinson, her little child, a Negro slave belonging to Travis, and a few Mexican women.

The Battle of the Alamo is well covered in many books, but the vast and wide implications of the history of the Alamo should be known by the people of the United States. What did it do? First, it showed that human beings can make sacrifices—and that there is such a thing as patriotism. This ought to be a lesson today. I do not mean that we should go out and offer ourselves to be shot or killed for the sake of gaining some point, although I believe that there are many hundreds of thousands of Americans that would be willing to do it, if they thought they would accomplish anything by it. By saying that there is such a thing as "patriotism", I mean that there is such a thing as patriotism now. The example of the Alamo should not be lost to us. If a man will willingly lose his life for the liberty of his people and for posterity, certainly now a man should be willing to lose his political life in standing up for the things that are right and just. The thing that faced the Texans was political tyranny; what we face now is a tyranny of the special interests, against the Government of the United States; and against these special interests, or the tyranny of those special interests, all of us must stand today.

The second thing that the Battle of the Alamo did was to start the momentous events which brought the great State of Texas as a part of the Union of the United States, and I call to your attention that Texas then had within its boundaries a part of Oklahoma, Kansas, Colorado, and New Mexico. Besides that, of course, the whole West became a part of the United States. As a result of the Battle of the Alamo there came to the United States its greatest mineral and oil and agricultural wealth; likewise millions upon millions of acres of great forests, also of grazing land, which with its cattle, has gone far toward making up one of the most powerful nations on the face of the earth.

During the time that Texas was a republic—from 1836 to 1845—she was twice invaded by Mexican armies. Texas, herself, attacked portions of Mexico during her 9 years of existence. In fact, the Republic of Texas lived for 9 years battling internal enemies among the Indians and battling Mexico, and it was a wonder that she preserved herself, having no well-founded financial system, and having nothing whatever to protect her except the resolute desire of the free-born Texans to live like human beings. That spirit that made them revolt against the dictator of Mexico, to preserve themselves, and to finally merge with the United States of America, was a brave spirit and the same spirit that we must have if we are to attack the problems of this depression and finally gain self-respecting lives as free-born American citizens.

It is not possible at this time to realize the daring of these Texans. Texas built a navy and decided to do some conquering on her own behalf—but briefly, the sad story of the Texas navy is this: The "authorities" managed, in the early part of 1836 to pick up a small navy of three vessels, namely, the Invincible, Capt. L. Brown; the Brutus, Captain Hurd; and the Independence, Captain Hawkins. The Invincible carried 8 port guns and 1 pivot 9-pounder; the Brutus of like force; the Independence of 8 guns. Later, the Liberty, with 3 guns, was added to the fleet. These boats captured a number of Mexican vessels. The Independence was captured by the Mexicans; the Invincible struck on breakers near Galveston Harbor and went to pieces. The Brutus ran aground during a battle with the Mexicans.

In 1838–39 the Texas navy was augmented by purchase of vessels: The San Jacinto, the San Antonio, the San Bernard and the Colorado. In 1839 the steamship-of-war, Zavala, purchased by Gen. James Hamilton, was added; also the Charleston. Due to the deplorable condition of the navy, the President of the Republic directed in 1842 that the vessels be placed in ordinary or be sold. They were placed in ordinary, and so remained until the annexation of the Republic to the United States.

There also occurred the Santa Fe Expedition, an ambitious enterprise of the Texans, but rather more foolhardy than otherwise. This expedition left Brushy Creek, about 15 miles above Austin, on June 21, 1841, with a military escort, commissioners from the Republic of Texas, and about 50 merchants and traders. For about 6 weeks the journey was pleasant enough, through a wild country which afforded plenty of game for food, and an abundance of water and grass for the horses and cattle. Then they entered a mountainous, arid region, and soon the last of the cattle were slaughtered and provisions ran short. To obtain food for more than 300 men was a difficult task. After wandering for some time, and being attacked by Indians on numerous occasions, some of the expeditions turned back. After experiencing much hardship, about 90 of the men reached a sheep ranch on the Rio Gallinas in New Mexico, where they were provided with food. Others of the party proceeded to San Miguel. Governor Armijo, of New Mexico, hearing of the approach of the Texans, set about to immediately alarm the people that the Texans were coming to conquer the country. When the expedition resumed its journey it was met by a force of Mexican soldiers, and captured. Governor Armijo and a force of 600 met the Texans on the way to Santa Fe, and they were taken to Santa Fe as prisoners. On October 17, 1841, the unhappy Texans were started on the long journey to Mexico City on foot. From the moment of their surrender the prisoners were treated with great cruelty by Armijo's soldiers, and the march from San Miguel to the border of New Mexico at El Paso was one of almost constant torture. Many of the men, who found it difficult to keep going, were shot down in their tracks and their bodies left by the wayside. At the border they were turned over to troops of the national government and marched to Mexico City.

Some of the members of the party who claimed citizenship of other countries appealed to their respective diplomatic representatives for aid, and through the effort of the foreign ministers at the Mexican capital these were released in the course of a few months. The Mexican Government reluctantly released those who could claim the protection of the United States or of European Governments, but the rest were kept confined in military prisons for 4 months. Waddy Thompson, of South Carolina, was sent to Mexico by the United States Government to procure the release of the citizens of this country. On June 16, 1842, most of the Texans were released by order of Santa Anna. Jose Antonio Navarro, one of the Texan commissioners, was kept in prison at the capital until December 1844. He was moved to Vera Cruz, from which place he escaped and returned to Texas in 1845.

And Texas was invaded by Mexico in 1842; and San Antonio was captured on the 11th day of September in that year by a Mexican Army under Gen. Adrian Woll, a Frenchman in Mexican service. He took 53 prisoners, who were thereafter known as the "Bexar prisoners", for San Antonio was then, and is now, a part of Bexar, now Bexar County, and the Twentieth Congressional District.

The Texans captured were marched barefooted through cold and heat, over cactus deserts, high mountains, through great forests and plains, through cities and towns to the Castle of Perote, a great prison and fortress between the cities of Jalapa and Puebla in Mexico, a distance of 1,200 miles, where they were held for 10 months. I have visited this huge prison—a cold, stern place of beautiful Spanish architecture, and there I saw the cell block of my grandfather, Samuel A. Maverick, one of the "Bexar prisoners."

The suffering of the Bexar prisoners cannot even be understood at this late date. The men were famished, starved, kept without news while their wives shifted for themselves in the vast, wild, Indian-infested prairies of Texas; and yet it stands as a fact, they never lost hope—continued to make the sacrifice through all these hardships and never lost their sense of humor. There were many tragic instances of death and suffering; they were serious men, but, as I said, they never lost their sense of humor. One of the instances was their celebration, in chains at Perote, of Texas' independence.

Familiar with the refinements of civilization they asked the Mexican authorities for good whisky and eggnog—but got horrible tequila—distilled from cactus—and goat milk; with this concoction they proceeded to celebrate, rattling their chains of slavery, taunting their Mexican captors and singing rowdy songs of the day. Some day I may be criticized for this, but the diaries of the prisoners attest to the truth of it. I trust my relative behaved with the dignity of a Congressman on that occasion.

Yes, Texas, and San Antonio will always really be a symbol of something worth while.

"Patriotism", according to Dr. Samuel Johnson, is sometimes "the last resort of the scoundrel"—and it is likewise the most precious thing to a decent human being. But I think it fair to say that there is a changing concept of patriotism. Wars are, or should be, over. Pioneering, as we once understood it, is over. But the war to make the world a decent place to live in, the pioneering of science, government, progress, has just begun. Those who are willing to be the new soldiers and pioneers will have a harder enemy to meet—the special interests, the exploiters, the gods of Greed and Hate—and they will use persecution, ridicule, hate. The enemies of civilization will use crooked finance, combines, the ridicule and falsity of a controlled press—and all of this will take far more courage than facing bullets. A bullet gives us peace, but the modern form of warfare lets us live in unhappiness, so I repeat we need more courage now than before.

Forgive me, however, for my philosophizing. Let me get back to the Alamo, to San Antonio, and to Texas.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Federal Government should recognize the Alamo, of San Antonio, Tex., as a monument of patriotism for future ages. I say this not because it is within my district, nor because I was born within a block of the Alamo, but because I believe the Alamo to be fully as important as the Battles of Lexington and Concord, and because I believe it obvious that it should be recognized as a national monument by all the people of the United States.

Of course, the Alamo is owned by the State of Texas, and Texans are very proud and jealous of it; they would probably object to passing title to the Federal Government. However, there is no reason why the Federal Government should not have, surrounding the Alamo, certain lands and properties in order to give it more fitting recognition. You know, we people down South come up East to see the historical points here, and we would like very much for the eastern people to come down South and see what we have there. Not only should they acquaint themselves with the great history of our Republic in Texas and how we came into the Union, but they should also see the civilization brought by the Franciscan Friars, the Spanish officials, and others who colonized and Christianized that area. Many Spanish colonial missions were established in Texas, and the most beautiful mission of all in the entire continent of North America is in San Antonio, Tex.

It is Mission San Jose, established near San Antonio in the year 1718. The rock carving there is not surpassed anywhere else in the world. It is in a good state of preservation and it is worth going all the way to San Antonio to see. There are other missions in San Antonio besides the Alamo and San Jose—the Missions Conception, San Juan de Capistrano, San Fernando, and San Francisco de las Espada.

I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a brief list of the missions of Texas:

THE TEXAS MISSIONS

1. San Francisco de los Tejas,[1] 1690, near Crockett, Tex.
2. Santisimo Nombre de Maria,[1] 1690, southwestern part of Cherokee County.
3. San Francisco de los Neches,[1] 1716, near Alto, Tex.
4. Purisima Concepcion,[1] 1716, Angelina River.
4. San Jose de los Nazones,[1] 1716, about 30 miles from Concepcion.
6. Nuestra Senora de Guadalupe,[1] 1716, at Nacogdoches, Tex.
7. Nuestra Senora de los Dolores,[1] 1717, at San Augustine, Tex.
8. San Miguel,[1] 1717, at Robeline, La.
9. San Antonio de Valero,[2] the Alamo, San Antonio, 1718.
10. San Jose de Aguayo,[2] 1720, Bexar County, near San Antonio.
11. San Xavier de Naxera,[1] 1722, Bexar County, near San Antonio, between San Jose and the Alamo; exact site unknown.
12. Espiritu Santo,[2] 1722, near Victoria, then to San Antonio River.
13. Purisima Concepcion de Acuna,[2] 1731, San Antonio, Bexar County.
14. San Francisco de la Espada,[2] 1731, Bexar County, near San Antonio.
15. San Juan Capistrano,[2] 1731, Bexar County, near San Antonio.
16. San Francisco Xavier,[1] 1746, San Gabriel River.
17. San Ildefonso,[1] 1749, on the San Gabriel River.
18. Candelaria,[1] 1749, on the San Gabriel River.
19. Nuestra Senora del Rosario,[1] 1754, near Goliad, Tex.
20. San Marcos,[1] 1755, on the San Marcos River.
21. Nuestra Senora de la Luz,[1] 1756, Atascosito, Chambers County.
22. Nuestra Senora de Guadalupe,[1] 1757, on Guadalupe near New Braunfels.
23. Santa Cruz or San Saba,[1] 1757, near Menardville on the San Saba.
24. San Lorenzo,[1] 1762, 70 miles southeast of San Saba.
25. Nuestra Senora del Refugio,[1] 1793, at Refugio, Tex.

In connection with the Texas centennial in 1936—every American should take a trip through the South. If you can, go by the Tennessee Valley Authority and see the greatest achievements of present American history—go by New Orleans, where you will also see some Spanish colonial civilization, besides French civilization—drive through Texas, and spend 2 or 3 days in San Antonio, which is one of the two or three most beautiful cities in America. If you have time, drive down into Mexico, where you will see many more beautiful cities, come back by San Antonio, drive out through the west through New Mexico, where you will see some of the most beautiful mountain scenery in the world, and also a great deal of some Spanish civilization, and then go through Arizona into southern California. You can then realize the might and greatness of the State of Texas and also realize the might and greatness of much of our southern part of the United States, of Texas, and of the West.

And then, when we realize the greatness of our continent and of our national history, let us get busy considering how we are going to set this country back on its feet, kill this awful depression, and to conserve, through national action, our natural resources, put people to work, and make it so one can live in decency and fair comfort, a good standard of living, with education, sanitation, and proper housing.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a compendium of Texas history from earliest times until it became a part of the United States. This compendium has been prepared for me by the Honorable J. Marvin Hunter, of Bandera, Tex., one of the foremost authorities on southwestern history in America. He is publisher of the Frontier Times. He began to print the Frontier Times 12 years ago, and he has collected together thousands of stories about the history of Texas and the great Southwest. The service that he has rendered the country is very great, and it should be recognized.

I find since coming to Congress that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is really read very widely by all classes of our citizens, but particularly students, teachers, and those doing research work. I have largely made this effort today for the permanent record of history, and now offer for printing the compendium of my distinguished fellow Texan, Hon. J. Marvin Hunter:

A COMPENDIUM OF TEXAS HISTORY COMPOSED BY HON. J. MARVIN HUNTER

The first white man who saw Texas was probably Alvarez de Pineda, who, in 1518, 20 years after Columbus, made a map which delineated Matagorda Bay, which he named La Bahia del Espiritu Santo.

In 1527 the Spanish King commissioned Panfilo de Narvaez to command a fleet which explored the country north of Tampico and east of Florida. Alvar Nunez Cabeza de Vaca accompanied this expedition. The fleet was lost in the Gulf of Mexico, and Cabeza de Vaca, with some of the crew, was cast upon the coast. After 8 years' wandering they reached a Spanish settlement in Mexico, and in due time reached Spain.

In 1538 Hernando de Soto reached Florida, and after 3 years in the country which is now the Gulf States, he reached and crossed the Mississippi River. De Soto died near the mouth of the Red River. His survivors traveled westward 150 leagues, which, from their description, has been identified as the eastern Cross Timbers of Texas.

In 1540 Francisco Vasquez Coronado set forth from Mexico with 250 horsemen and 70 Spanish infantry, accompanied by a number of priests, and passed through the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, through New Mexico, and entered Texas, their route being across a portion of the Staked Plains.

In 1682 a company of Spaniards under Espejo visited the upper Rio Grande and established missions at El Paso and Santa Fe.

In 1685 the coast of Texas was visited by Robert Cavelier de La Salle, who sailed from France with 4 ships and upward of 300 persons, to plant a colony at the mouth of the Mississippi. The fleet sailed too far to the westward, and entered Matagorda Bay. La Salle crossed the bay and ascended the Lavaca River, where he erected Fort St. Louis, since known as "Dimmit's Point." In March 1687 he was cruelly assassinated by one of his own men.

The first Spanish mission in east Texas was established in 1690 on the Neches River.

The first Spanish Governor of Texas was Don Domingo Teran de Los Rios, who was appointed in 1691.

In 1692 a village called San Fernando (now San Antonio) was begun near the head of the San Antonio River.

The Mission San Antonio de Valero was commenced on the Rio Grande in 1703 and removed to the San Antonio River in 1715 and to the plaza in the city in 1718.

In 1714 the Mission Nuestra Senora de Guadalupe was started on the Guadalupe River.

In 1715 was also commenced the missions at La Bahia, Nacogdoches on Ayish Bayou and at Adaes, on the east side of the Sabine.

San Antonio was erected into a presidio November 28, 1730, and the next year citizens for the new city were brought from the Canary Islands. The transportation of 16 families, consisting of 57 persons, cost the royal treasury $72,000.

On March 5, 1731, was laid the foundation of La Purisima Concepcion, and a short time later the missions Las Espada, San Juan, and San Jose were commenced.

The foundation of the Alamo was laid in 1744.

In 1778 the foundation of the old stone house in Nacogdoches was laid, and in 1790 the Mission of Our Lady of Refuge, Refugio, was commenced. This was the last mission undertaken by the Franciscans in Texas. For a century they had labored for the civilization of the Indians. Some of their mission churches have disappeared. Other massive structures still stand, monuments to the religious zeal and enterprise of their founders.

Under the right of prior discovery by La Salle, the French still laid claim to Texas. By a royal charter, dated September 14, 1712, Louis XIV granted to Anthony Crozat the whole of Louisiana, including all the territory drained by the Mississippi. In 1718 the territory of Louisiana passed to the control of the Company of the Indies, of which John Law, the celebrated financier, was the leading spirit. In the latter part of this year, war broke out between France and Spain. As soon as this was known, St. Denis, who was in command at Natchitoches, collected a few soldiers for the invasion of Texas. The French expelled the Spaniards from Nacogdoches, and advanced as far as San Antonio. The controversy as to the ownership of Texas was kept up by different parties for more than a century.

In 1729 a number of powerful Indian tribes formed a coalition for the expulsion of all the Europeans from the country between the Mississippi and the Rio Grande. In 1732, Governor Bustillos organized a military expedition and chastised the savages, and secured peace to the settlements.

In 1762 France transferred her Louisiana possessions to Spain.

In 1800 Spain retroceded Louisiana to France, and in 1803 Bonaparte sold it to the United States.

At the close of the eighteenth century Texas had a population estimated at about 6,000, of which one-third were in San Antonio; and there were permanent settlements at Goliad, Nacogdoches, and other points.

The increasing prosperity of the American Republic and the claim that Texas was included in the purchase of Louisiana, excited the jealousy of the Spaniards, who adopted a proscriptive police.

In 1800 Philip Nolan, Ellis P. Bean, and 18 others left Natchez, Miss., to hunt wild horses in Texas. Arriving on the high prairies, between the Trinity and the Brazos, Nolan halted and erected a block house. Lieutenant Musquez and about 100 Spanish soldiers attacked the house, and Nolan was killed. Bean was captured and sent to Mexico in irons.

In 1806, Lt. Zebulon M. Pike, of the United States Army, while on an exploring tour toward the headwaters of the Rio Grande, was discovered by the Mexicans, arrested, and sent home under an escort. The next year Colonel Freeman, sent out by President Jefferson to explore the Red River country, was also discovered by the Mexicans, arrested, and sent home.

In 1805 Governor Don Antonio Cordero advanced from La Bahia (now Goliad) to the Sabine with a military force to hold the country.

In 1812 Lt. Augustus W. Magee took possession of Nacogdoches. September following, with about 300 followers, he captured Goliad without a fight. Magee died February 1, 1813, and was succeeded in command by Samuel Kemper. This small army took the name of the Republican Army of the North, and started for San Antonio, where the Spaniards had been reinforced and numbered about 2,000. On the 5th of March, 1813, after severe fighting, the Spanish commander surrendered his sword to Kemper. A month later another Spanish army, said to number about 3,000, and after a siege, was defeated by the Republicans.

In 1819 Dr. James Long organized at Natchez an expedition for the invasion of Texas. He crossed the Sabine in June of that year. At Nacogdoches he organized a provisional government and sent detachments of soldiers to occupy the trading posts in eastern Texas. At Goliad Long was betrayed and taken to Mexico City. Later he was liberated, and soon afterward assassinated in that city.

Moses Austin, then a resident of Missouri, heard glowing descriptions of Texas, and resolved to apply to the proper authorities for permission to introduce 300 families into Texas. In pursuit of this scheme he visited San Antonio. At first he was ordered to leave the Province; and as he left the office of Governor Martinez he met Baron de Bastrop, an old friend he had known in Louisiana. Through the influence of Bastrop the Governor was induced not only to rescind the order for Austin's banishment, but to join the municipal officers of the city in recommending his project to General Arredondo at Monterey. Austin hastened back to make arrangements for introducing his colonists. Shortly after reaching Missouri, Austin died, leaving, however, a dying injunction that his son, Stephen F. Austin, should carry forward his plans.

Stephen F. Austin was in New Orleans when he heard of the success of his father's application, and he immediately started for Natchitoches, where he met the Mexican commissioner, Don Erasmo Seguin, sent there with the decree of Arredondo, and who was accompanied by Don Juan Veramendi. These Mexican gentlemen accompanied him to San Antonio, arriving there August 13, 1821, and he was cordially received by Governor Martinez. After examining the country, and choosing the region between the San Jacinto and Lavaca Rivers for a location, Stephen F. Austin returned to New Orleans. The schooner Lively was purchased and loaded with provisions, farming utensils, etc., and with 18 persons on board, sailed from New Orleans for Matagorda Bay November 20, 1821, and was never hear from afterward.

The same day the Lively left New Orleans Austin started for Texas by land, being joined at Natchitoches by 10 companions. The party reached the Brazos River the last day of the year. Austin hastened to the coast to meet the party of the Lively. For nearly 3 months he waited, when, receiving no tidings of the missing vessel, he finally gave her up for lost.

Introducing the 300 families required by the first contract, Austin, under the colonization law of April 1825, entered into another contract for 500 more. In 1827 he took a third contract for 100 families, and the next year a fourth for 300.

On the 18th of April 1825 Hayden Edwards took a contract for the introduction of 800 families into east Texas.

In 1826 Joseph Vehelin obtained a charter to colonize a large scope of country and was requested to introduce Swiss, Germans, and French.

At the same time David G. Burnet obtained a grant to colonize the region north of Vehelin's colony.

In 1829 Lorenzo de Zavala obtained a grant to colonize the country bordering upon the Sabine.

Martin de Leon obtained two contracts, the first in 1825 to introduce 41 families and the second in 1829 for 150 more, all to be located near the Guadalupe River. The territory still higher up the river was granted to Green DeWitt in 1825.

On the coast between the San Antonio and Nueces Rivers, Hewitson and Powers introduced some colonists, having in 1828 obtained a contract for 200 families. The same year McMullen and McGloin contracted to introduce a similar number into San Patricio County. Most of these latter colonists were Irish.

In 1830 Sterling C. Robertson and Alexander Thomson entered Texas with some colonists, but some difficulties arose with the Mexican authorities, and most of these families settled in Austin's colony. Sterling C. Robertson was ordered to leave the province, but in April 1934, by decree he was reinstated as empresario, and succeeded in introducing some 300 families.

B. R. Milam was given a colonization grant, but disposed of his contract to Baring Bros., London, England.

General Filisola obtained a charter for colonizing the territory north of that given David G. Burnet, and the Red River country was given to John Cameron. Contracts were also awarded to Frost Thorn, Stephen J. Wilson, and Padilla and Chambers, but no steps were taken to settle the territory. West of the Nueces, in the State of Coahuila, Beale, and Grant introduced a few English colonists. After 1825 a large number of immigrants came to Texas on their own responsibility, selected homes and obtained titles to their land, under the provision of a general colonization law.

The law of 1824 guaranteed to foreigners settling in Texas security for their persons and property. Ten coast leagues and 20 leagues bordering on the United States were reserved from location. Under Austin's first contract, by previous agreement, the colonists were to pay 12½ cents an acre. This, however, was never collected.

The early inhabitants of Texas endured many privations. Meat could be procured by hunting, but families were sometimes for weeks without bread, and sugar and coffee were luxuries seldom obtainable. The men dressed mostly in buckskin, the women in such fabrics as could be obtained.

In Austin's colony, up to 1828, Austin himself exercised the functions of empresario. He held the rank of lieutenant colonel in the Mexican Army. He also held the office of supreme judge.

One of the first acts of the Mexican National Congress, assembled under the constitution of 1824, was the erection of former provinces into states similar to those of the American Union. Texas was connected temporarily with the neighboring State of Coahuila. The legislative body of the united state was called a congress, and was composed of 12 members, of whom Texas was entitled to 2. A representative, if not a native of Mexico, must have resided 8 years in the country, and was required to be worth $8,000 or to have an income of $1,000 annually. Popular elections were held on Sunday, the people not voting directly for the congressmen but for electors, who subsequently elected them.

On the 6th of April 1830, President Bustamente issued a proclamation prohibiting any further immigration into Texas from the United States. In 1831 customhouses were established at Nacogdoches, San Antonio, Copano, Velasco, and Anahuac. By decree of April 7, 1832, foreigners (meaning Americans) were forbidden to carry on a retail trade in the country, and a considerable body of troops were sent into Texas.

The first serious difficulty between the colonists and the military occurred at Anahuac, when Colonel Bradburn proclaimed martial law and arrested a number of citizens for whom he had conceived a dislike, and confined them in the barracks. By another military decree all the ports of Texas were closed, except Anahuac. It was not expected that Anglo-Americans, with their inborn love of liberty, would tamely submit to such outrages. Meetings were held and measures devised to effect the release of the prisoners in the stockade. A company was organized under the command of Francis W. Johnson, who demanded the immediate release of their fellow citizens. Bradburn refused to accede to the demand. General Piedras was approaching from Nacogdoches with reinforcements, and as soon as he ascertained the true state of affairs, superceded Bradburn (who immediately left for New Orleans) and released the prisoners. At this juncture, news arrived of a revolution in Mexico. Santa Anna had pronounced against Bustamente, and proclaimed anew the Constitution of 1824. A public meeting at Turtle Bayou June 13, 1832, gave a cordial assent to this republican movement. This placed the Americans in Texas in harmony with the Liberal Party of the Nation.

In the month of May, the assailing party at Anahuac needing cannon, went to Velasco to get two which were at that place, but Colonel Ugartechea declined to let the cannon pass Velasco. Volunteers were called for to capture the garrison, and 112 men responded. The cannon were placed on board the schooner Brazoria, in charge of Captain Russell, and floated down the river. Captain John Austin conducted the remainder by land. These, when they arrived at the mouth of the river, were formed into two companies. Captain Brown, with one company, took position near the beach. Captain Austin, under cover of darkness approached within a few rods of the fort, carrying palisades of plank for protection, and, working in silence, threw up temporary breastworks. The battle commenced about 12 o'clock at night, June 25, 1832. Just after daylight a shower of rain fell damaging the ammunition of the assailants. The party on the vessel kept up the fight, and the riflemen were especially successful in picking off gunners who mounted the parapet to fire the cannon. After 10 hours' fighting a white flag was raised in the fort, and the garrison surrendered. In the fight the Mexicans lost 35 killed and 15 wounded. The loss of the Texans was 8 killed and 27 wounded.

The attachment of Texas to Coahuila was inconvenient, unnatural, and in many respects, disadvantageous to Texas, which now had a population equal to that of the smaller states of Mexico. A convention was held in San Felipe de Austin in April 1833, and a constitution was drafted by Sam Houston. It was adopted and submitted to the national authorities for approval. Judge David G. Burnet drew up an able memorial, showing the disadvantages under which Texas labored, and the necessity for a separate state government. The government refused to grant the Texans' request.

In 1834 Coahuila was convulsed with a revolution, which still more forcibly illustrated the necessity of separating Texas from Coahuila.

Perhaps Texas might have become and remained a Mexican State had the Mexicans maintained a republican form of government. But the Republic had disappeared, Santa Anna had abandoned the liberal party, and was making strides toward absolute power. The constitution of 1824 had been swept away, and the mass of the people disarmed.

The revolution in Mexico was completed on the 3d of October 1835. The state of chaos in Coahuila left Texas comparatively without civil government. At this period, when the public mind was unsettled, Austin, who had been in prison in Mexico reappeared in Texas, having been released from his long confinement.

Gonzales has been denominated the Lexington of Texas. A cannon had been given the citizens for defense against the Indians. Colonel Ugartechea, in command at San Antonio, sent Captain Castanado, with 150 men to seize this gun and carry it to San Antonio. The Texans rallied under Capt. Albert Martin, and resolved to retain it. By the 1st of October the Texan force at Gonzales had increased to 168. John H. Moore was elected colonel. The Texans manned the cannon and went out to attack Castanado. The fight opened with the discharge of the cannon, when the Mexicans precipitately retreated toward San Antonio, and the Texans returned in triumph to Gonzales.

On October 8, the Texans, under Captain George Collingsworth, attacked and captured Goliad, taking 25 prisoners, several pieces of artillery, 300 stands of arms, and about $10,000 in money.

On the 6th day of November 1835 the independence of Texas was declared, and on the 12th a provisional government was organized, with Henry Smith for Governor; James W. Robinson, Lieutenant Governor; and Sam Houston, commander in chief of the regular army.

The Texans, who, had, on the first alarm of war, gallantly repulsed Castanado, were not prepared for a regular campaign, and many of them soon returned to their homes. Those remaining in camp were without a recognized leader. In the contingency General Austin was selected as commander in chief.

At San Antonio the Mexican garrison had been strengthened by the arrival of General Cos and numbered about 1,000 men. This city was Austin's objective point. With his army he crossed the Guadalupe River and on the 20th of October he arrived at the Mission La Espada, 9 miles from the city. He sent a detachment of 92 men, under Colonels Bowie and Fannin, to reconnoiter and if possible select a camping ground near the city. On the morning of the 28th this detachment found themselves confronted on 3 sides by 400 Mexican soldiers. After some severe fighting the Mexicans retreated to the city, leaving their 6-pounder on the field. In this engagement the Texans had one man killed. The Mexicans' loss was not accurately known, but 16 dead bodies were lying near the abandoned cannon, which had been fired but 4 times.

On November 28, General Austin, who had been appointed Commissioner to the United States, resigned the command of the army, and was succeeded by General Burleson.

On December 5 the Texans, under General Burleson, Colonel Neil, Col. Ben Milam, and F. W. Johnson, began an assault upon the city of San Antonio, which continued for several days, during which time Colonel Milam was killed. General Cos, the Mexican commander, on the morning of the 9th of December, surrendered the city and the Alamo to the Texans.

On December 10 the executive council passed a decree ordering an election of delegates to a general convention. The 22 municipalities were to elect 56 delegates; the election to be held on the 1st of February 1836, and the convention to meet in Washington-on-the-Brazos on the 1st of March.

It was soon discovered that the executive council was too unwieldy for prompt action. A rupture occurred, and on the 11th of January the council, by a unanimous vote, deposed Governor Smith, and installed Lieutenant Governor Robinson as Governor. The Governor declined to surrender his office, and a wordy controversy ensued, which was protracted until the meeting of the convention in Washington-on-the-Brazos.

The delegates to the convention assembled on the 1st of March. Richard Ellis was elected president and H. S. Kimble, secretary. On the second day of the session a declaration of independence was unanimously adopted. By the 15th a constitution had been prepared, and on the 16th a government ad interim was inaugurated, with David G. Burnet for president and Lorenzo de Zavala vice president. Sam Houston was appointed commander in chief of the forces in the field. The convention adjourned on the 17th, and a few days afterward President Burnet and the members of his cabinet removed to Harrisburg.

Texas was now the only Mexican province that disputed the authority of Santa Anna, and he immediately began preparations for its subjugation. He sent his main army across the Rio Grande at Presidio, and thence to San Antonio, while a supporting column advanced along the coast from Matamoras to Goliad. Santa Anna arrived at Saltillo, Mexico, toward the last of January 1836. On the 16th of February he was at Guerrero. The advance of the army reached the heights of the Alazan, overlooking the city of San Antonio, on the 22d of February. On the approach of the Mexicans Col. W. B. Travis, with 144 men, retired to the Alamo.

Santa Anna sent a summons to the garrison to surrender. This was answered by a cannon shot from the battery. Travis had 14 cannon but only a limited supply of ammunition. A blood-red flag, proclaiming "No quarters", floated over the church in the city.

On the 24th Travis dispatched couriers to San Felipe and to Goliad for help. The Mexicans bombarded the fort without effect.

The siege was kept up for several days. On March 2 Capt. John W. Smith with 32 citizen-soldiers from Gonzales, forced their way through the Mexican lines and entered the fort. On the 3rd Col. J. B. Bonham, who had been sent to Goliad for reinforcements, returned and rejoined his companions in the fort. On Sunday morning, March 6, the 13th day of the siege, the Alamo fell, every man dying at his post. The only persons spared were Mrs. Dickinson and her little daughter, Mrs. Alsbury and child, and a Negro belonging to Travis. The garrison numbered about 180. The loss of the enemy was 521, with a like number wounded. Santa Anna's assaulting force numbered between 4,000 and 6,000.

On March 17 Fannin, with several pieces of artillery and about 400 men, was en route to Victoria, from Goliad, and when on Coleta Creek was attacked by the Mexicans under Urrea. Urrea received heavy reinforcements, including a park of artillery. Without adequate protection against the enemy's cannon, destitute of water, and surrounded by an army five times as large as their own, the Texans saw no alternative but to surrender. A white flag was hoisted, and terms of capitulation agreed upon.

The prisoners were marched back to Goliad and confined in the old mission. Most of these prisoners were from Georgia, and constituted what was known as the "Georgia battalion." On the night of March 26 a messenger arrived from Santa Anna with orders for their execution. This order was faithfully executed the next morning, Palm Sunday, March 27. Without warning the privates, in four columns, were simultaneously marched out in different directions, each one strongly guarded. When at a short distance from the fort, at a given signal, all were halted and shot. The most of them were killed instantly. Some, who were only wounded, were dispatched with sabers, and a few, by feigning death, escaped it. After the privates had been put to death the officers and wounded were murdered in the fort. All the bodies were left unburied, though partially burned in a brush fence. Eight physicians and attendants were spared; 27 made their escape; 330 were slain.

After the capture of San Antonio and Goliad, Santa Anna considered Texas subjugated, and intended to return home, leaving his generals to reestablish Mexican laws and institutions, but Almonte and Filisola, two of his ablest generals, reminded the President that all the Texans thus far encountered were recent volunteers from the United States, and that the real strength of the colonists was unimpaired. Feeling the force of these observations, Santa Anna prepared to push three columns into the heart of the country.

Gen. Sam Houston arrived at Gonzales on the 11th of March, and found 500 men in the army, most of whom had been in the campaign of 1835. That same evening he received news of the fall of the Alamo, and the expected advance of Santa Anna. As his force was inadequate to cope with the enemy, he ordered a retreat. This was commenced about midnight March 12, the families removing with the army. The Texans crossed the Navidad River on the 14th, and the Colorado on the 17th. When he crossed the Colorado, Houston's army had increased to 600 men. He remained on the east side of the river, at the old Atascosita Crossing (Columbus) until the 25th, and recruits continued to arrive until he had an army of 1,200 to 1,500 men. On the 26th the Texans took up the line of march for San Felipe, where instead of crossing the river, Houston changed his course up the stream, and camped in the Brazos bottom from the 29th of March until the 12th of April. On the day Houston encamped on the Brazos, Santa Anna started the bulk of the central column from San Antonio, and with his personal staff arrived at Columbus on the 5th of April. Leaving the heavy ordnance and most of the infantry to follow he hastened on and reached San Felipe on the 7th. A small company of determined Texans, under Capt. Mosely Baker, disputed the passage of the river, and Santa Anna turned down to seek another crossing. He arrived at Cole's on the Bernard on the 9th, rested on the 10th, and sent out a foraging party to procure supplies of corn, etc.

On the 12th Santa Anna reached Richmond, and captured a ferryboat. On the 15th, late at night, the Mexicans reached Harrisburg. After remaining there 2 days, he marched his advanced column down to New Washington, and on the morning of the 20th he started a small boat, loaded with provisions, up to Lynchburg, where he intended to cross his army and march eastward. The boat fell into the hands of the Texans and furnished an acceptable supply to hungry soldiers. That morning Santa Anna's scouts notified him of the arrival of Houston's army at Lynchburg. About the middle of the day the Mexican scouts came in sight of the camp of the Texans and by the middle of the afternoon the whole force, with the commander, had arrived and camped within a mile of the Texans.

Toward evening the artillery of the Mexicans, supported by the cavalry, was deployed in front and a little to the right of the Texans' camp. General Sherman, in command of the Texas cavalry, marched out to repel the threatened attack. The discharge of the Texan cannon, and the gallant charge of Sherman, checked the advance of the enemy.

About 9 o'clock on the morning of April 21, 1836, General Cos arrived with 500 additional troops, swelling Santa Anna's force to about 1,600 men. To meet this army Houston had only 783 men. Erasmus (Deaf) Smith was dispatched to Vince's Bridge, across a bayou. The whole Mexican army had crossed this bridge, and knew of no other chance to retreat. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the Texans attacked Santa Anna's forces, rushing impetuously upon the foe, shouting "Remember the Alamo!" "Remember Goliad!"

The Mexicans were not expecting an attack at that late hour in the day. Many of them were taking their evening siesta. Even Santa Anna was asleep. Before their lines could be formed the Texans were over their breastworks, taking their cannon. The battle lasted only a few minutes, but the victory was complete. As "Deaf" Smith had destroyed Vince's bridge, the Mexicans could not escape. The Texans lost 8 killed and 25 wounded. The loss of the Mexicans was 630 killed, 208 wounded, and 730 prisoners, including the President of Mexico. The Texans captured all of the artillery and camp stores of the enemy and the military chest containing $12,000 in specie.

After the decisive battle of San Jacinto, things moved rapidly toward the successful establishment of the Republic of Texas. On July 23, President Burnet issued a proclamation ordering an election for President, Vice President, and members of Congress. The people were also to vote on the adoption of the constitution, which had been framed by the convention in March, and also on the question of annexation. The unsettled state of Mexico secured Texas from danger from that quarter. Santa Anna was still held a prisoner, but after the meeting of Congress in October his irons were removed, and after the adjournment of that body, General Houston released him and sent him, at his own request, to Washington, D. C.

At the election held in September, Sam Houston was elected president and M. B. Lamar, vice president. The constitution was adopted by an almost unanimous vote, and the vote was equally strong for annexation. Congress met at Columbia on October 3. On October 22 Generals Houston and Lamar were duly installed in their respective offices.

Thus closed the revoluntionary period of Texas, the darkest and the brightest period in Texas history.

At the election held September 3, 1838, Mirabeau B. Lamar was elected president, and David G. Burnet, vice president.

In 1841 Sam Houston was elected President and Edward Burleson, Vice President.

In 1844 Anson Jones was elected President, and Kenneth L. Anderson, Vice President. President Jones convened an extra session of Congress on the 16th of June 1845, and this body promptly passed a bill assenting to annexation with the United States. A convention met in Austin on July 4, 1845, on the same day Congress passed the annexation bill. This, with a new constitution, was submitted to a vote of the people October 13.

On the third Monday in December a general election was held for State officers and members of the legislature. That body assembled in Austin, and on the 19th of February 1846, Anson Jones, the last President of the Republic of Texas, handed over the executive authority to J. Pinckney Henderson, first Governor of the State of Texas. On December 29, 1845, President Polk signed the bill extending the laws of the United States over Texas; and the same day Governor Henderson was inaugurated, the Postal Service of the Union was extended over the State, and the customhouses and other public property of the late Republic relinquished to the United States. Thus annexation was consummated, and the Lone Star, the emblem of the youngest born of republics, was merged in the constellation of the American Union.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not want 5 minutes; I just want to express my deep appreciation to the members of this committee for the recent vote and to say that all those who voted against us did so for what they considered a good reason; but you come down to Texas, and we will forget all about that vote, and we will show you where the sons of your own States enacted a drama upon that stage as heroic as devotion and courage and capacity ever placed within the opportunity of any generation.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETTE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 131, pursuant to House Resolution 264, he reported the same to the House with sundry amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts moves to recommit the Senate joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment:

"On page 6, line 4, strike out '$3,000,000' and insert '$1,500,000.'"

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 39, noes 86.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The previous question having been ordered, if the House were to adjourn now, this vote would be the first order of business on Monday, would it not?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 188, answered "present" 2, not voting 151, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House resolution (H. J. Res. 293) was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7672) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 18 to the foregoing bill.

"GRASS ROOTS" CONVENTION AT SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech which I made over the radio last Sunday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I made over the radio last Sunday:

Less than 2 weeks ago I had the privilege of attending a great patriotic gathering. I refer to the so-called "grass roots" convention at Springfield, Ill., where some 20,000 men and women voluntarily assembled for the purpose of holding conference with each other. They were there for the further purpose of figuratively sitting at the feet of the great Lincoln in order that from the memory of his character and wisdom they might obtain guidance for their own course in another critical period of the Nation's history.

There were close to 8,000 accredited delegates, my home State of Minnesota sending some 300 to the prairie States conference.

Had the invitation been more general and the preliminary preparations covered a longer period of time, I doubt if the Illinois capital could have held all that would have come.

I have seen many political conventions and gatherings of a various nature but I have never seen anything so impressive as the "grass roots" conference.

The times, the critical condition of our national affairs, the necessity of meeting a situation with courage and with wisdom, all conspired to make of this unofficial conference something a great deal out of the ordinary. Throughout the history of the gathering pervaded the spirit of the martyr President. Lincoln's tomb is in Springfield. Illinois was his home State and one cannot move in that region without discovering something which recalls his simple but magnificently successful life. However, the greatest monument ever reared to Lincoln is the memory that remains of his life. The greatest lesson he extends today is the courage, the sanity, and the honest naturalness with which he grappled with the problems of his own time. They, too, were unusual. There was no charted course to guide him except the letter and spirit of the American Constitution. With that went the history of our people, the traditions that have acquired the force of law, the devotion with which men and women in every crisis have given their all—first to establish the conditions of the American Nation, and then to maintain them.

During the time I was in Springfield I visited the little log settlement of New Salem, where Lincoln spent his early manhood. I shall always be glad that I did this. From that visit I received an insight into the history of Lincoln, into the meaning and purpose of his life, that I think I never would have obtained elsewhere.

The little hamlet, resting in the bend of the Sangamon River, is an exact replica of the frontier settlement in which Lincoln mastered surveying, in which he sold calico and brown sugar over the counter of his little store, where he gazed at the stars, and where he grieved over the loss of his first sweetheart, Ann Rutledge. The place has been restored by William Randolph Hearst, who, in doing so, has contributed richly to the traditional history of our country.

Gazing at these log buildings, and looking into the window of the little store in which Lincoln worked, one gathers the immensity of the solitude in which this great natural genius must have dwelt. Here is the spirit of American frontier life in which Lincoln battled his own way. Here were the grass roots of his own time. The people who dwelt there with him were simple people. They were the Nation's advance guard, reflecting the emotions of their times and struggling with a poverty which made them sympathetic with all the aspirations of the human soul. Lincoln was a part of all this. In these conditions he reflected upon the mysteries of life, and with an analytical power never excelled, studied and evaluated the issues of the day.

The problems of every age are new and peculiar to their time. Yet there is a relationship between all of them, and there is a unity in history that cannot be avoided. In our American history we can no more determine upon a course, or make a political decision without regard to the past than can a man forget the influences which have made him what he is at the moment, and then start all anew as if the past had never been.

It is this unity which made the influence of Abraham Lincoln so all-pervasive at this remarkable gathering. Here were the representatives of a great political party, born out of the travail of the struggle for human freedom. That party had, under the leadership of Lincoln, fought a great war, first that the Declaration of Independence concept, that all men are created equal, should be made a reality, and secondly that the Nation built up under the Constitution should survive. For almost 60 years, with slight intermissions, the party organization of which Lincoln was a chief founder, has borne the responsibilities of a great National Government during a period of unprecedented national progress.

This particular conference found the party in a period of defeat. Found it chastened by misfortune. Yet found it equally devoted and as unselfishly so as when Lincoln led it to its first embattled victory.

Another great Illinoian was a spokesman for the gathering. Frank O. Lowden has a record of probably having been the greatest Governor this country has yet produced. The study of his administration is a triumph of efficiency. Today he emerges like Cincinnatus of old, from his farm home—America's elder statesman, devoted to his country, and willing to give of the latter years of his life to the preservation of its best qualities. Lowden is of the West. He has long understood its problems, and his championship of western agriculture is of long standing. Like Lincoln, Lowden is a self-made man. Born in Minnesota he early emerged from the poverty which remained with Lincoln as a badge of distinction up to the time he entered the Presidency.

With something of the Lincolnian power of keen analysis, Governor Lowden applied the scalpel to the new deal, and when he had finished he had a shouting audience enthusiastically acclaiming the sound common sense with which he had examined our present-day programs.

The "grass roots" convention was not an official body. It had no authority to speak for the Republican Party. On the other hand, it represented the prairie States section of the Union, and this viewpoint, as expressed in a tentative platform, voiced the liberal and wise point of view of the Middle West. It was out of this section that the fire and enthusiasm of the early Republican Party found its voice, its inspiration, and its leadership. It is natural that again from this section, where the American home folk still dwell, there should come the new dedication to duty and patriotic service.

Party lines have been loosened greatly in this day of the radio and of quick interchange of thought and views. Nevertheless, party organization is essential and while the Republican Party may have been beaten, it has not lost its splendid courage and its high ideals. This was demonstrated at the Springfield meeting.

The platform commits the party to a forceful stand for social justice, for liberal policies, for social security, for the protection of American agriculture, and for an adequate tariff policy which will protect the man on the farm and in the shop.

It places the Republican Party in the position of intelligent and constructive criticism of the new-deal politics, which, after 2 years of reckless brainstorming experimentation, finds unemployment continuing, of governmental expenditures increasing, and an insidious opposition to the constitutional provisions of the Government without which there can be no real America for you and me.

Instead of a philosophical acceptance of the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court, we find the administration in our Nation's Capital obstinately discussing the advisability of a centralized bureaucratic government in Washington, which would wipe out State lines and obliterate the local character of our Government, under which union has been possible and progress made possible.

It was a notable fact at this conference that it was a woman who "stole the show." Mrs. Simmons, a Democratic farm woman from Missouri, made the speech which probably stirred more genuine enthusiasm than any other, not even excepting the masterly address given by Frank Lowden.

Another notable feature of the convention was the presence there of several thousand Jeffersonian Democrats. They came to pledge their support to the Republicans in making a fight to retain our constitutional form of government. They made it plain they did not come as converts to Republicanism. They remain Democrats. But, first and foremost, they are American citizens.

It was the Democratic following of Stephen A. Douglas that made possible the success of Lincoln's program. It would be a singular duplication of history if it were the Democrats of today who, by patriotic disinterestedness, make it possible to retain our orderly process of government and sustain the Constitution for which Webster argued and Lincoln fought.

The declaration of principles adopted at the Springfield gathering is the most momentous ever to be ratified at any unofficial political gathering in all the history of the Republic. They declare unequivocally for the rights of the States and against undue encroachment on the part of the Federal Government. They reaffirm our beliefs in the rights of the individual, and they pledge the Republican Party to carry out the principles of Lincoln, Garfield, McKinley, Blaine, and Theodore Roosevelt. These principles have restored the confidence of the American people in representative government.

"GRASS ROOTS" RESOLUTIONS—DECLARATION OF REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES INCLUDES PLEDGE TO FIGHT FOR PRESERVATION OF STATE RIGHTS

The text of the report of the Resolutions Committee to the Republican "Grass Roots" Conference follows:

Declaration of principles:

The conference of Republicans of the Middle Western States offers reverent gratitude to Almighty God for the wisdom, courage, and faith of our forefathers, who established on American soil and, through sacrifice and far-sighted vision, have maintained the eternal principles of human rights and human liberties.

We renew our faith in those principles and solemnly rededicate ourselves to the perpetuation for our posterity of the blessings which have accrued to us from their establishment and maintenance.

HOLD STATE RIGHTS VITAL

These American principles are the basis of Republican creed and Republican policies, and we translate these principles into some, but not all, of the policies which we favor. We make no pretense of attempting to write a platform, but we urge the consideration of the matters herein stated by the proper representatives of the Republican Party.

Republican creed:

We believe in the Constitution of the United States.

We believe that the constitutional separation of the powers of government into legislative, executive, and judicial should be maintained.

We believe that the maintenance of the independent sovereignties of the Federal Government and the several States, as guaranteed by the Constitution, is vital to the maintenance of our American system of government, and we reaffirm the wisdom of our forefathers, who reserved to the States their power over matters of intrastate and local concern and delegated to the Federal Government certain power over specified matters of national concern.

PRAISES ECONOMIC SITUATION

We believe in the maintenance of our American political and economic systems as established by our forefathers and developed over a century and a half of unparalleled progress.

We believe that they are sufficiently flexible to meet all of the needs of a complex civilization, while preserving those enduring principles derived from the accumulated experience of mankind.

We believe that our present troubles are not due to any inherent defects in our American system, and can be effectively dealt with within the framework of our Constitution.

We believe that a free press, open discussion, and honest criticism are essential to the preservation of free institutions.

We believe in individualism and in individual enterprise, as opposed to communism, socialism, fascism, or any other form of collectivism, no matter in what form it masquerades, whether as a "new deal", a "planned economy", or otherwise.

FREE ENTERPRISE FAVORED

We believe that our American system of free enterprise is the one, above all others, capable of providing the great mass of the people with a substantially higher standard of living and greater economic security, without loss of freedom, through an ever-widening distribution of property ownership among American families.

We believe that the successful functioning of the American system demands that the competitive system be maintained and fostered and that individual initiative be encouraged.

We believe that once economic freedom is destroyed, political liberty must suffer the same fate, and that aside from its contribution to material progress, there is a moral value to liberty which justifies any sacrifice to preserve it.

We recognize and approve the principle of collective bargaining, the representatives of labor to be of labor's own choice. We are opposed to the employment of women in industry, that their health and welfare may be safeguarded. We are firmly committed to the principles that wages in America must be kept consistent with American standards. We recognize that the maintenance of the American standard of living of the wage earner is an essential element of national recovery.

OLD-AGE RESERVES FAVORED

We recognize that the security of our citizens demands Government aid in the establishment of old-age and unemployment reserves.

We are grateful for the valiant and sacrificing service of our men of all wars and pledge ourselves to see that justice is accorded them.

We believe that the resources of our country and the enterprise and industry of our citizens are such that the existence of an immense and permanent class of dependents is as unnecessary in the future as in the past; that Americans will continue to demand work at decent wages, not the dole of public charity, and that this demand can be generally and promptly met once American industry is freed from the uncertainties of indefensible experiments and the attempt to force American life into new and alien molds.

We believe in the equality of economic opportunity for all men, irrespective of race or color, in accord with the humanitarian beliefs of Abraham Lincoln.

We believe it to be our duty to accept the challenge of the defeatists who would repudiate our country's past, and betray its future, and to appeal to our countrymen to rally to the defense of American institutions.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

Governmental policies:

Guided by the principles expressed in our Republican creed, we advocate the following:

1. The immediate adoption of a policy of economy and thrift in Government with due allowance for essential relief expenditures as opposed to the present spending policy of waste and extravagance.

2. The prompt attainment of a balanced Budget, not by the misleading method of double bookkeeping but by the honest method of bringing the expenses of the Government within the limits of its income.

3. A sound currency based on gold and definitely stabilized by Congress so that individual enterprise may have confidence in the future value of the dollar, in terms of which every man's plans for his present or future must necessarily be made. This is a necessary foundation of enduring national recovery.

Every effort should be made to extend this stabilization so that it will be international in character.

4. The immediate withdrawal of Government from competition with private industry.

5. The maintenance of the vitality and free growth of American industry through the preservation of the competitive system, protected against monopoly by the vigorous enforcement of antitrust laws so that small businesses may be preserved and the door of equal opportunity kept open to all.

6. The rigid enforcement of all laws, civil and criminal, to prevent and punish dishonest or unfair practices in business, industry, and finance; this is essential to the conduct of legitimate business and the protection of our people.

STAND FOR AGRICULTURE

7. National recognition of the needs of agriculture. Agriculture is a fundamental industry of the United States. No high standard of living can be attained or long enjoyed which is indifferent to agriculture. The farmer combines in one the functions of capital, management, and labor. He constitutes that class, the decline of which throughout the history of all nations has been followed by national disintegration. Any program for national security must inevitably start with agriculture. We hold that no economic advantage of agriculture thus far attained shall be surrendered.

The farmer is, of right, entitled to a fair and proportionate part of the national income and to receive a parity price for the products of his farm in domestic markets. Recognizing these facts, we endorse the enactment of such legislation, approved by the farmers themselves, as will accomplish such purposes. While it is recognized that agricultural products will suffer certain price fluctuations, the same as in the case of other business, we hold that the stabilization of the farm market will go further than anything else toward the stabilization of all business and the elimination of recurring panics and depressions with their tragedies of bankruptcy and unemployment. We endorse the statement of Governor Lowden in this conference that so long as we have a protective tariff for the benefit of industry we should give to agriculture corresponding benefits for that portion of the products of the soil which goes into domestic consumption. We further recommend research by the Government looking to the creation of new outlets in industry for agricultural products. The machinery of Federal land bank loans should be used to refinance farm mortgage debts at low rates of interest.

"WORK FOR THE WORKERS"

8. Work for the workers. With men out of work, as now, the capital structure of the Nation is not only being impaired, but undermined. Willful, wanton, and reckless spending of our people's moneys are likewise undermining the physical assets of our nationals. The vitality and the integrity of our economic laws grow out to the formula of nature's processes. Naturally, there is an economic fraternalism between the farm, industry, and all workers. Working together that great trinity can make, and always will make for the peace, happiness, and an ever-increasing prosperity of all our people. Radicals and reactionaries always have and probably always will make for unbalancing the advantages of the working together of this healthy trinity. It is for this reason the policies of such trouble makers never can prevail to the proving point of such process. The Republican Party, since Lincoln, progressively gave the workingman the full dinner pail, a living wage, and a saving wage. We now pledge ourselves to the encouragement of an economic fraternalism between the trinity of farm, workers, and industry that will enable the workers to earn and receive work for the workers at protective wages.

9. The breaking down of arbitrary restrictions that throttle world commerce, such as quotas and exchanges restrictions. They, and not reasonable tariffs, are the real enemies of world trade.

10. Continued protection to farm and home ownership, and continued provision, in cooperation with State and local governments, for those that are in need until private enterprise absorbs the present army of unemployed. We urge these policies as means of ending the depression. By their adoption the wheels of commerce and industry will begin to turn, and relief rolls will be reduced, the unemployed will find work at fair wages through private enterprise, and hope and happiness will reenter the American home.

EAGLE PASS & PIEDRAS NEGRAS BRIDGE CO.

Mr. WEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2326) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Eagle Pass & Piedras Negras Bridge Co. a portion of the Eagle Pass Military Reservation, Tex., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. McREYNOLDS submitted a conference report (Rept. No. 1282) on the bill (S. 2276) to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make new reports on those bills reported by the Library Committee and to which members of the Claims Committee objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to submit supplemental reports on various bills reported by his committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

A CONGRESSIONAL RECORD DIGEST—EIGHT-PAGE SUMMARY FOR BUSY READERS—DIGEST ON INDEX PLAN PRACTICAL

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the daily RECORD covering the second session of the Seventy-third Congress averaged about 94 pages. Many of us have experienced considerable difficulty in going over a RECORD of this size every day. For some time I have been thinking of the advisability of a daily index to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I am assured by those who know that it can be done. I would suggest that an 8-page digest of the RECORD be made daily.

DAILY DIGEST AND INDEX NECESSARY

For sometime Members of the House and Senate and other readers have found it impossible to read all of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The 60 RECORDS allotted daily to each Congressman for distribution reach only a small number of his constituents, and only a small percentage of that group find time to read the RECORD.

We can perform a fine educational service by distributing, say, 500 or more copies of an 8-page daily digest to 500 homes in each congressional district of this country. We would not disturb the regular detailed CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Let that go on as in the past.

OFFICIAL REPORTER'S STAFF TO BE INCREASED TO COVER DIGEST SERVICE

A digest can be prepared from the official transcript, or directly from the debates themselves at the time they occur. Speed would be facilitated by having the RECORD digest reporters on the floor at the time of the debates. A well-trained news reporter might qualify for such a position. If the reporter is uncertain as to the main point of any speech, he can easily determine that by communicating with the Member whose speech he is condensing. I have the assurance of those who are in a position to know, that this service can be performed for the Congress and the public without difficulty.

In past years reporters of great newspapers and news services have occupied chairs at the desk of the House and ably condensed and digested the proceedings day by day. What has been done can be done. We all have long waiting lists for RECORD requests we cannot fill. Suppose you had available tomorrow 500 more copies of a digest of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in addition to the regular complete RECORD quota. At once your waiting list is supplied, and you have copies to spare for distribution—this to the great benefit of the general public.

A DAILY CONGRESSIONAL RECORD INDEX

Another project worth considering is the publication of a daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD index with each publication of the RECORD. RECORDS are now indexed every 2 weeks, and I have found, from my own experience and from talking with other Members of the House that the bimonthly index is not available when we want it. It is good as far as it goes but it is not sufficient. The speeches we wish to locate must be found at once. A daily digest would give us the necessary information in each RECORD from day to day, and for more detailed information on any speech we could refer to the daily index and the complete daily RECORD.

8-PAGE DIGEST PRACTICAL

Members generally agree that the digest should not be over 8 pages. From the Printer's standpoint the condensation should be made in 4, 8, or 16 pages, so that there will be no waste of paper. It might be well to experiment with the digest, having it 8 pages at first, and longer or shorter later on should Members prefer. Any such condensation would save the busy man's time and perform an invaluable service to thousands of citizens who now have no access to the daily proceedings of Congress.

DIGEST AND INDEX PLAN FAVORED BY THE PUBLIC

The office of the Congressional Digest should be in the Capitol Building, in the office of the Official Reporters. After the digest has been completed, the manuscript is delivered to the Government Printing Office and printed the same night, simultaneously with the full RECORD. It will be delivered daily in the same manner our present daily RECORD is now delivered. Our constituents favor this plan. It will aid us in serving the people who elected us to Congress, and congressional information will be carried to a much wider circle of citizens.

I present this matter for the consideration of the Members of the House.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, within a few weeks this session of the Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States will pass into history. At times during its life differences of opinion on policies of our National Government have been abundantly expressed in debate on the floor of this House. Few measures have received unanimous approbation. Some have been approved or disapproved by slight majorities; others by an overwhelming vote of the membership of this body. The success or failure of its major acts will be determined only with the passage of time and, fairly or unfairly, justly or unjustly, partially or impartially, will be passed upon and judged by the American people.

The party in power will be held responsible and either lauded or condemned for its legislative accomplishments. The sins of commission can always be explained; the sins of omission have no defense. This truth applies equally to those affiliated with the majority party and those allied with the minority. While the burden of proposing constructive legislation in a Congress whose Membership is of the same political thought as that of the administration, is as a practical proposition, almost confined to the membership of that conviction, it is within the power and becomes the duty of the minority Members, if they perceive omission or neglect on the part of those in power to provide adequate enactments of law for the benefit of the public generally, to step into the breach and suggest or propose what they think is for the best interests of the Nation. Without going into the merits or demerits of its labors, when this session of the Seventy-fourth Congress adjourns, it will no doubt leave upon the statute books laws affecting agriculture, banks, labor, relief of the unemployed, national defense, war profiteering, and social security.

Up to the present time, however, it has failed to seriously consider the deplorable condition of thousands of small industries located in all parts of the 48 States, Territories, and possessions which before the depression were the lifeblood of our commercial existence. Hundreds of our factories have been forced to close because of their inability to get funds for working capital. Thousands are in need of adequate machinery and equipment. All require rehabilitation of their plants. Loans for these purposes are difficult to obtain through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and almost impossible through private capital or banks. In the administration of banks our Governments, both State and National, have gone from one extreme to the other. In 1932 our banks were suffering from frozen assets; now they are afflicted with frozen cash. To turn this cash then into the channels of business should be our concern. Idle factories cannot resume operations without the necessary capital, nor can many going concerns continue without financial help. At the present time there is a demand for goods of all kinds, but in order to create markets for them the purchasing power of the people must be increased. The outstanding factor in getting out of this depression is to put men and women back to work where the results of their labor will create wealth. Nonproductive relief is but temporary and not lasting. Relief to idle factories, encouraging them to resume operations on a productive basis will again, in my judgment, start us on our way to create the wealth necessary to provide decent living conditions and some of the luxuries in life to which every American worker is entitled.

Hon. Jesse H. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, testified before the House Committee on Banking and Currency which was conducting hearings on the bill to extend the functions of that Corporation. In answer to a query as to whether there was not plenty of money in banks to loan to local industry and if they would not lend it if they thought they had a chance to get the money back, he said:

> A bank might feel that a loan is good in time, but commercial banks are not supposed to loan for 3, 4, 5, or 6 years.

Being asked if he thought banks were inclined to invest available money in Federal bonds rather than industry, Mr. Jones said:

> No; they would rather lend it to industry if they could get notes that would justify it, and would not be criticized by the departments supervising them, State or National, and when the borrower might pay it back in a year or two.

On April 15 of this year Secretary of Commerce Roper made public the report on small industries submitted to him by the Business Advisory and Planning Council for the Department of Commerce. After months of study of the small industries situation throughout the country the Council submitted to the Secretary the following specific recommendations:

> The Council strongly recommended an immediate study by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Federal Reserve Board, and Securities and Exchange Commission in cooperation with the investment bankers of the country, to the end that facilities be offered sound, small industries for the acquisition of needed capital.

After describing the needs of small industries based on surveys made on behalf of the Council by the Bureau of the Census of the Department of Commerce the report said:

> "With the continued restoration of business activity the need of small industry for intermediate and long-term capital has become increasingly urgent. There seems to be little doubt that a large number of the smaller manufacturing concerns have been able to withstand the effects of the long-drawn-out depression in part through sharp curtailment of expenditures on repairs of building and equipment and in part through the reduction of inventories of raw materials, parts, and supplies to a hand-to-mouth basis. Not only is existing equipment wearing out at a rapid rate, but it is also becoming obsolete. The necessity for buying raw materials, etc., in limited quantities prevents concerns from acquiring them at satisfactory prices. Both factors operate to increase manufacturing costs and to reduce profits.
> It is clear that the capital structure of American industry as a whole has been impaired by these and other factors and the ability of the industrial concerns, in particular, to borrow from the banks for working-capital purposes has been correspondingly lowered. In this connection the committee has been greatly impressed by the fact that the bulk of the advances and commitments made by the Federal Reserve banks have been for periods of more than 1 year.
>
> The inability of the smaller concerns to modernize their machinery and equipment explains in no small measure the continued depression in many of the capital-goods industries.
> As a matter of fact, long-term financing for small industry has always been difficult. It is not simply a depression problem. Through private investment bankers it has been available only to concerns of sufficient size and standing to warrant the investment banker in bringing out an issue as small as, for instance, $1,000,000. So it may be said this facility has been practically denied to smaller concerns. Such enterprises have been obliged to develop their capital structures gradually out of undistributed capital. They have not received the benefits of recourse to the capital markets for their long-term requirements.
> Since small industry plays a very important part in the economic life of the Nation, and since its activities contribute so much to those of the larger plants, it would seem the part of wisdom to provide the smaller, sound industrial concerns with the long-term credit facilities they require. This would make for safer commercial banking as well as for cheaper and better financing for industry as a whole.
>
> This is and should be a natural function of the investment banker acting as the channel for the safe investment of private funds in small enterprises.
>
> At the moment this channel is blocked by the too rigid requirements of the Securities Exchange Act; by a general fear of the future on the part of investment bankers; and by the waiting attitude of the investing public.
> The need exists and is of paramount importance to recovery. Mainly it is an investment need rather than a credit need. It should be filled.

Mr. Speaker, having this situation in mind and believing that small industries have been the forgotten man in the maze of legislative proposals offered for the consideration of the present Congress, I have introduced H. R. 8250, which has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The enactment of this bill will create what shall be known as the "United States Industrial Loan Insurance Corporation" with a capital stock of $1,000,000,000 to be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States.

The allotment of time during which I am permitted to speak does not permit a detailed explanation of this bill, but, generally speaking, the Corporation will be authorized to guarantee to Federal Reserve banks or State or national banks—whether members of the Federal Reserve System or not—payment of the principal and interest upon notes or evidences of indebtedness held by such bank or banks and issued for industrial purposes, which may be for raw materials, finished products, products in course of production, new equipment, the construction, repair, or remodeling of industrial plants, or additional working capital for such enterprises. The paper issued by any one borrower and covered by guaranties of the Corporation will at no time exceed $500,000, and must mature on or before the expiration of 5 years.

The powers and duties vested in or imposed upon the Corporation will be exercised by its executive officers at the direction of a board of 12 directors. These directors will be appointed by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One will be appointed from each Federal Reserve district, and not more than seven shall be members of any one political party. None of the directors will be permitted, directly or indirectly, to engage in banking, the making of loans, or the buying and selling of mortgages, securities, or other evidences of indebtedness, nor may they actively engage in any manner in any other business, vocation, or employment during their incumbency in the office of director of the Corporation. In each Federal Reserve district there will be a technical advisory committee composed of persons who have had at least 10 years of practical industrial executive experience, appointed solely on the basis of merit and without regard to political affiliations, and whose duties will be to investigate and report on all applications for loans and the security therefor, appraise the value of industrial property, the assets, machinery, and equipment of borrowers if necessary, and advise the officers and directors of the Corporation from an impartial standpoint as to the true status of assets, plants, security, orders for goods, accounts receivable, machinery, equipment, or anything of a technical nature which would be beneficial in determining the advisability or inadvisability of guaranteeing the loans of the various applicants.

The board of directors will be required to make an annual report to the President of the United States of the operations of the Corporation and publish from time to time such additional reports of its operations as it deems advisable.

This bill further provides that payments by an industrial concern on the principal of any note or evidence of indebtedness eligible for guaranty by the United States Industrial Loan Insurance Corporation, as well as expenditures not to exceed $500,000 out of surplus earnings for labor or materials for new construction, repairs, remodeling, or equipment of a manufacturing plant, shall be deemed allowable deductible items in determining the net income of such concern under the Revenue Act of 1932.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the enactment of legislation of this character will give hope and encouragement to employers of labor; it will release into circulation idle excess currency now resting peacefully in the vaults of our State and national banks; it will establish permanent credit facilities for small industries; it will promote sounder banking practices and establish cooperation between small banks and small industries; it will enable the latter to modernize their machinery, equipment, and buildings; it will revive the building trades; it will not only provide immediate employment for the unemployed but it will protect the industrial worker who is now employed. In short, this legislation will encourage home production and home consumption. For thousands it will mean jobs, not temporary and irregular, but permanent and lasting. It will help industrial America to help itself.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MILLER, at the request of Mr. DRIVER, indefinitely, on account of physical disability.

To Mr. SEARS, for 1 week, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 7672. An act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution authorizing the erection of a monument to Grover Cleveland in Washington, D. C.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution authorizing the erection of a monument to Grover Cleveland in Washington, D. C.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet, in accordance with its previous order, on Monday, June 24, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

SENATOR CARTER GLASS, OF VIRGINIA

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this week four great universities—Yale, Princeton, William and Mary, and Wesleyan—and Tufts College, of Massachusetts, have seen fit to confer the degrees of doctor of laws upon our esteemed colleague the senior Senator from Virginia, CARTER GLASS.

These honors have been worthily bestowed. These four great universities and this outstanding college in New England have honored themselves in thus honoring Senator GLASS.

Mr. President, I have known Senator GLASS more or less intimately for 25 years. He was one of the leading Members of the House when I first went to that body 25 years ago. He was the author of the Federal Reserve law, enacted in President Wilson's first administration. There was hardly a word in it that was not discussed on the floor of the House, Senator GLASS piloting the bill through to a successful conclusion.

In the House he made a wonderful record for himself and for the people he represented. Much is now being said about his independence of thought and action. He was just as independent 25 years ago as he is today. Honest, sincere in his every contention, in his every action, he held the highest esteem of all those who knew him, both inside and outside the House of Representatives.

Later on he was appointed Secretary of the Treasury by President Wilson to succeed Mr. McADOO, and made another great record as Secretary of the Treasury. He became a United States Senator on February 2, 1920, and has been a Member of the Senate since that time. We all know his record in this body.

It has been my good fortune, Mr. President, to serve with Senator GLASS on the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, of which he is the distinguished chairman. In my association with him there, although I had known him well before, I have learned what a great and noble man he is. In every instance he does what he believes to be right. He is a Democrat—every inch of him. He is an American—every inch of him. Over and above all, he is a man and a gentleman—every inch of him.

Mr. President, it is indeed gratifying to Senator GLASS' friends in and out of Congress to know that these great honors have come to him. It is almost, if not quite, unprecedented that one man should receive these highest of honors from five great institutions of learning within the month. Such unusual distinctions rarely fall to the lot of any man. He deserves them all because of his services to his home people, to his State, and to the Nation to which he has so long and faithfully given the best that is in him.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post of June 20 concerning the bestowal of these distinguished honors upon Senator GLASS, together with certain statements referring to him.

There being no objection, the editorial and statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 20, 1935]

CAUSA HONORIS

This week two of the country's leading universities, Princeton and Yale, have separately conferred the degree of doctor of laws upon Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia. These honors are a well-deserved tribute to the courage, integrity, and ability of a man who during long years in the service of his State and his Nation has won enduring place in the long line of illustrious leaders which the Old Dominion has given to this country.

The senior Senator from Virginia is one of those rare individuals who knows how to defend his convictions fearlessly without becoming either a doctrinaire or an obstructionist. He has the happy faculty of compromising without capitulating, and of maintaining his independence without disavowing party allegiance, and thus sacrificing influence in helping to frame legislative policies.

It is therefore particularly fitting that Senator GLASS should be singled out for these signal academic honors at a time when the too rare qualities of practical statesmanship have been put to an exceptionally severe test. There are other Members of the Senate whose learning, forensic skill, and idealism make them peers of Senator GLASS. But few, if any, Senators have had as long or as successful career in fighting political opportunism, in maintaining fundamental traditions, and in forwarding truly progressive legislation.

It is not alone as a "dauntless leader of the independent force of public opinion", as the Yale citation puts it, that Senator GLASS holds a unique position in the political world of today. As a notable representative of his State, and as an outstanding national figure he himself symbolizes the value of the Federal system of government, which he so well understands and has done so much to preserve.

Professor Nettleton said at Yale University:

"Recognized officially as the senior Senator from Virginia, recognized throughout the Nation as a dauntless leader of the independent force of intelligent public opinion; a representative of the people, 'who never sold the truth to serve the hour', or the party, or the populace. Representative at Washington in nine successive Congresses, Secretary of the Treasury under President Wilson, Senator of the United States, thrice confirmed by popular vote and public demand, he recalls the Roman courage and constancy, and the integrity of the ancient phrase, 'Senatus, populusque Romanus.' This year the National Institute of Social Science conferred upon him its gold medal 'in recognition of distinguished services rendered to humanity as one of the leaders in the planning and creation of the Federal Reserve Banking System * * * and as one who has through a long life consistently and unsparingly devoted his abilities and energies to public service.

"'Tis, finally, the man, who, lifted high,
Conspicuous object in a nation's eye—
Who, with a toward or untoward lot,
Prosperous or adverse, to his wish or not—
Plays, in the many games of life, that one
Where what he most doth value must be won,
Whom neither shape of danger can dismay,
Nor thought of tender happiness betray;
Who, not content that former worth stand fast,
Looks forward, persevering to the last,
From well to better, daily self-surpast
Vir amplissimus."

President Angell, in conferring the degree, said:

"Statesman and patriot, instant in the defense of your country's welfare and honor, implacable foe of sham, dishonesty, and cowardice in public life, able and fearless leader whose sage counsel has for more than a quarter of a century contributed wisdom to our national policies. Yale University, in grateful recognition of your eminent service to the Nation, confers upon you the degree of doctor of laws and admits you to all its rights and privileges."

Princeton University, in awarding the degree of doctor of law to Senator GLASS, announced:

"CARTER GLASS, United States Senator from Virginia for 15 years, Secretary of the Treasury under President Wilson. A thorough student of banking and finance, his extensive knowledge and concern for the public good were revealed in his authorship and defense of the Federal Reserve Bank Act, which became law through the staunch support of Woodrow Wilson in the face of vigorous opposition from those who now acclaim its virtues. A debater of rare ability, understanding his subject and human nature; a courageous statesman, governed only by his judgment and conviction, and neither influenced not intimidated by the new political device—the barrage of inspired letters and telegrams."

President John Stewart Bryan, of William and Mary, said:

"In time of crumbling standards he has stood like a rock in a wasted land. An eternal foe to ignoble compromise, undeterred by demagogery, unblinded by fallacy, unswerved by speciousness, with the courage of a soldier, the certainty of a scholar, the wisdom of a philosopher, and the devotion of a patriot, he has brought to his high responsibilities the statesmanship that became a Secretary of the Treasury, a Senator of the United States, and a son of Virginia."

Address of Governor Cross in presenting CARTER GLASS for the degree of Doctor of Laws at Wesleyan University on June 16, 1935:

"From the very beginning of American exploration, Senator GLASS' Commonwealth has been associated closely with our own. So it may be seen in the magnificent seventeenth-century charts of the New World, whose finely engraved, superbly hand-colored pages bear such delightful designs of Indian war canoes and gallant English ships, stockaded villages and trim green forests, with all manner of wild life—the turkey and the heron, furry bears and foxes and antlered deer, and still more engaging creatures of the deep—that one cannot cavil at the poetic license of their geography.

"Only the other day I looked at one of these maps, printed in the very year when our Commonwealth was founded—just three centuries ago. There we were, by the grace of art, almost side by side—Connecticut and the Old Dominion—Anglia Nova et Virginia. In our long association we have sometimes even run the risk of being confused, one of us being taken for the other. An English gentleman, for example, making in 1713 a gift of Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World to the university in New Haven, wrote on the flyleaf that he was thus sending Sir Walter back to the Virginian shores.

"From the time the Colonies were settled our zeal for education and for culture has formed a strong common bond between the Senator's Virginia and our Connecticut. So has the zeal for tobacco culture. Perhaps it is the general use in both our States of that favored weed—so conducive to quiet meditation and leisurely talk—that accounts for our common tempo, our ideal of an even pace, which others call conservatism. For this ideal there is a phrase in the Latin, once so dear to southern statesmen and Yankee wits: Festina lente, which a modern college student translates: Go as fast as you can without going 'hay wire.'

"But towering above all these mutual interests, material and intellectual, is another tradition that has sprung from the good earth of Virginia and Connecticut, binding us together in community of spirit. This is the tradition of devoted public service. In all generations able, high-minded citizens of both our Commonwealths have given themselves freely, bravely, and honorably to the Nation and to the State.

"We of Connecticut stand uncovered before Virginia as the long roll is called of her great and faithful servants—Washington, Jefferson, Marshall. But I need not read the roll, for the names still ring today in proud and affectionate memory—in our memory as in years.

"There is no man living who deserves so well a place in the immortal company of these kindred souls as he who is here today, as their ambassador and our most welcome guest. The long career of CARTER GLASS has been preeminent for the integrity, the conspicuous intelligence, the unsparing industry, and the militant courage with which he has shouldered the responsibilities laid upon him. He has stood for good government in a time when government was a task never so perplexing, never so back breaking. He is a Virginia public servant. There can be no warmer praise.

"I have the honor to present, for the degree of Doctor of Laws, the Honorable CARTER GLASS."

Dr. George W. Davison, president of the board of trustees of Wesleyan University, presented the degree of doctor of laws to Senator CARTER GLASS in the following words:

"Worthy son of Virginia, which has given so many notable men to the service of our country—in all your public life you have exemplified that independence of thought and courage in action which are the fundamentals of representative government.

"Justum et tenacem propositi virum non civium ardor prava jubentium—A just man tenacious of purpose not yielding to popular clamor for that which is wrong."

CARTER GLASS

Citation pronounced by John A. Cousens, president of Tufts College, in awarding an honorary degree commencement June 17, 1935.

"Slowly evolving through 800 years, the idea of representative government, proud contribution of the English-speaking peoples to political science, has alone made possible on a truly national scale the practical application of the theory of democracy. That there shall be available to serve the state high-minded citizens, courageous, unselfish, faithful to lofty ideals, unswerving in their allegiance to the right, as God gives them to see the right, is of supreme importance. Happy his immediate constituents, fortunate his fellow countrymen, represented in the Congress of the United States by the senior Senator from Virginia, CARTER GLASS, fearless leader, whose statesmanship makes him a superb exponent of democracy's essential need, doctor of laws."

ELECTRIC RATE SURVEY IN NEVADA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a compilation completed through the electric rate survey of the domestic and residential rates in effect in the State of Nevada on January 1, 1935, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

A concurrent resolution memorializing and requesting the Congress of the United States to pay to Zoe A. Tilghman, the widow of William (Bill) Tilghman, on account of the killing of said William (Bill) Tilghman by Federal prohibition officer

Whereas on November 1, 1924, a Federal prohibition officer (Wylie Lynn) shot and killed William (Bill) Tilghman, a State peace officer who had arrested the said Wylie Lynn for creating a disturbance; and

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States, after a full investigation, reported that "the facts and circumstances point to a wanton and deliberate murder" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. 16, 1933); and

Whereas Congress voted and paid to the widow of Henry Virkula $5,000, whose husband was also killed by Federal officers, while he was in the act of fleeing from the law; and

Whereas this sum was paid within 3 years after his death, and although more than 10 years has passed since the killing of officer Bill Tilghman, and in spite of the acknowledgment of the justice of this claim by the House of Representatives of the United States nothing has been done in the way of payment to the widow of "Bill" Tilghman; and

Whereas the payment in the case of the man killed while fleeing from the law and withholding said payment from the widow of the man killed in upholding the law appears unjust and tends to encourage law-breakers and radicals and to discourage good and faithful officers and to cause good citizens to lose respect for the law and is a reflection on the Government and against public policy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifteenth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully memorialized and urged, in view of their having recognized the justice of this claim, that said Congress delay no longer in applying the remedy hereto to give the widow of said "Bill" Tilghman such reparation as may be just and equitable.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas, after painstaking study and careful deliberation, the Senate and the Assembly of the State of New York, on the 8th day of April 1933, duly passed chapter 158, laws of 1933, known as the "milk-control law of New York State", in order to protect from unfair competition and to preserve from serious injury the dairy industry of this State, determined upon such study to be the paramount industry within the State in respect to both numbers engaged and capital invested; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has in the case of People v. Nebbia (291 U. S. 502) sustained the constitutional validity of an intrastate price structure under control and regulation of a State agency designed to accomplish the purpose hereinabove set forth; and

Whereas, as a result of the determination of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Seelig v. Baldwin et al., handed down March 4, 1935, the State of New York is powerless to afford the dairy industry of New York State the protection from the competition of price cutting in milk produced in other States, to the detriment and threatened destruction of the producers of milk in the State of New York: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the public welfare and livelihood and property of those engaged in the production of milk and milk products in the State of New York being imperiled by the existing and threatened continued influx into the markets thereof of cheap milk produced in neighboring States, comprising what may be termed the "New York Milkshed", such condition existing and threatened is hereby declared by the Legislature of New York State to be a matter of vital and urgent concern, State and local, and the correction thereof to be a State and local purpose of national as well as local concern, the remedying of which requires prompt and effective action to prevent the sale within the markets of the State of New York of milk purchased from producers outside the State at prices under those provided to be paid to New York producers of milk to compensate them for the requirements placed upon them by the State of New York to assure the production of an adequate supply of good, clean, wholesome, sanitary milk, for the attainment of which goal legislative action by the Congress of the United States in aid of the State of New York and other States which may find themselves in like situations is deemed essential;

The people of New York State, by its senate, assembly, and Governor, do hereby earnestly petition and memorialize the President and the Congress of the United States, in behalf of New York State and other States producing milk and dairy products in large quantities, that legislative action be taken by the Congress of the United States for the public welfare, protection of industry, and proper regulation of interstate commerce in milk to that end.

It is respectfully urged that such legislative action by the Congress of the United States, in the light of the conditions revealed to exist in respect of interstate commerce in the milk and shed areas or marketing districts within the United States; and further, that the Congress, within such areas as defined, vest the States with power to control such commerce between the States in respect of milk to the extent of providing that upon shipment into and arrival within a State for sale therein of such milk, the same shall be subject to the laws of such State as if said milk had been produced therein.

By such action the Congress will vest in the sovereign control of the several States, within well-defined areas and subject to proper Federal action in respect thereof, the protection of a vital industry in which conditions demand such protective measure.

Such act, if and when adopted by the Congress of the United States as a measure designed to bring orderly marketing agreements and control into an industry facing chaos and unbridled competition, will effectually remove the danger of utter destruction and disintegration from the paramount industry of New York State and others similarly situated, will properly fix the responsibility in the areas so defined, and will permit of and foster interstate compacts within such milk-marketing areas—all to the end that social and economic rehabilitation be attained in such vital industry; and it is further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Congress duly elected from the State of New York, and that the latter be urged to use their best efforts to accomplish the purpose of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Whereas the heroic feat of Christopher Columbus in discovering the Western Hemisphere in the year 1492 is recognized throughout the world as one of the outstanding accomplishments of all time in the world of science and exploration; and

Whereas several of the United States, including the State of New York, have recognized Christopher Columbus as a great benefactor of the people of the United States by declaring October 12 to be a State holiday in such respective States and by providing for other means of paying tribute to the name of Columbus; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Legislature of the State of New York that national honor should be paid to him in recognition of his great feats of exploration, navigation, and scientific research: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, memorialized to enact such measures as may be necessary to provide for the observance of October 12 as a national holiday to be known as "Columbus Day"; and be it further

Resolved (if the senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate and to each Member of Congress and to each Senator elected from New York State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Whereas there is pending in the House of Representatives a bill known as the "Rudd bill", House No. 6, authorizing the Postmaster General to construct underground pneumatic tubes for the transmission of mail between the general post office in Brooklyn and the Floyd Bennett Field, Barron Island, Brooklyn, and the five postal stations lying parallel to Flatbush Avenue between these two points, namely, Stations Times Plaza, B, Flatbush, Kensington, and Vanderbilt; and

Whereas the construction and operation of such underground pneumatic tubes would be of great convenience to the people of Brooklyn and would greatly expedite the delivery and dispatch of air mail in a borough of the city of New York, in which is located some of the most enterprising industrial establishments in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested to expedite the passage of House bill no. 6, and that a copy of his resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of Congress from New York State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON], which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Club Social Puertorriqueño, of New York City, N. Y., endorsing a resolution adopted by the Committee Pro-Puerto Rican Economical and Political Legislation, of New York City, favoring the adoption of a suggested legislative plan looking to the economic recovery of Puerto Rico, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) authorizing and directing the Comptroller General of the United States to certify for payment certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920 as per a certain contract authorized by the President, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 929) thereon.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3120) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain moneys to "Funds of Federal prisoners", reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 930) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 237) for the establishment of a trust fund to be known as the "Oliver Wendell Holmes memorial fund", reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 931) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2399. A bill to permit citizens of the Philippine Islands to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy (Rept. No. 932); and

S. 2434. A bill for the relief of George W. Hallowell, Jr. (Rept. No. 933).

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2034) to prevent the fouling of the atmosphere in the District of Columbia by smoke and other foreign substances, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 928) thereon.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 201) giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, and for other purposes incident to said encampment, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 935) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2830. A bill to repeal sections 1, 2, and 3 of Public Law No. 203, Sixtieth Congress, approved February 3, 1909 (Rept. No. 936);

S. 2831. A bill to amend (1) an act entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia"; (2) an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia"; to regulate the giving of official bonds by officers and employees of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 938); and

H. J. Res. 280. Joint resolution for the designation of a street or avenue in the Mall to be known as "Maine Avenue" (Rept. No. 937).

Mr. KING also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7526) to amend the act approved February 20, 1931 (Public, No. 703, 71st Cong.), entitled "An act to provide for special assessments for the paving of roadways and the laying of curbs and gutters", reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 939) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1381. A bill to amend the act approved February 13, 1925, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code and to further define the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts of Appeals and of the Supreme Court, and for other purposes" (Rept. No. 942); and

S. 1382. A bill to provide for the taking of depositions in criminal proceedings, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 943).

Mr. BILBO, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2939) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ronald A. Cox, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 940) thereon.

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5809) to amend an act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia", reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 941) thereon.

STEAM HEAT FOR FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD BUILDING

Mr. CONNALLY. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 7652) to authorize the furnishing of steam from the central heating plant to the Federal Reserve Board, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 934) thereon.

Mr. President, this is a measure to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish steam to the new Federal Reserve Board Building, and until the bill shall be enacted the construction work cannot proceed. It is rather an urgent matter, and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior through the National Park Service be, and he is hereby, authorized to furnish steam from the central heating plant for the use of the Federal Reserve Board on the property which has been acquired by it in squares east of 87 and east of 88 in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the Federal Reserve Board agrees to pay for the steam furnished at reasonable rates, not less than cost, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Federal Reserve Board agrees to provide the necessary connections with the Government mains at its own expense and in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That hereafter the rates to be paid for steam furnished to the Corcoran Gallery of Art, the buildings, old and new, of the Pan American Union, the American Red Cross Buildings, and such other non-Federal public buildings as are or hereafter may be authorized to receive steam from the central heating plant shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts which may be inconsistent or in conflict with this act are hereby repealed to the extent of such inconsistency or conflict.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

On June 20, 1935:

S. 1180. An act to amend section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended.

On June 21, 1935:

S. 314. An act for the relief of Vito Valentino; and

S. 1052. An act for the relief of the Washington Post Co.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. POPE:

A bill (S. 3122) to add certain lands to the Boise National Forest in the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 3123) to provide for the relief of public-school districts and other public-school authorities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 3124) for the relief of M. L. Goldfarb;

A bill (S. 3125) for the relief of J. A. Hammond;

A bill (S. 3126) for the relief of Capt. Henry T. Korner; and

A bill (S. 3127) for the relief of O. W. Waddle; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3128) for the relief of Daniel Yates; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3129) for the relief of the dependents of Max Grady Sullivan, deceased; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BACHMAN:

A bill (S. 3130) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Tennessee and certain of its political subdivisions to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Tennessee River at or near a point between Dayton and Decatur, Tenn.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BLACK:

A bill (S. 3131) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge and causeway across the water between the mainland at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, Ala.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DAVIS:

A bill (S. 3132) for the relief of Mary Ellen Tiefenthaler; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NYE:

A bill (S. 3133) for the relief of William R. Kellogg; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3134) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge for the district of North Dakota; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. POPE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8554, the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 22, line 7, to insert the following:

"There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 for applying such methods of eradication, control, and prevention of the spreading of the white pine blister rust as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary to accomplish such purposes: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the cost or value of trees or other property injured or destroyed."

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN TAXES—AMENDMENT

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 324) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

At the end of the resolution add the following:

"SECTION —. The tax imposed by section 603 of the Revenue Act of 1932 shall not apply to toilet soaps sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer after the date of the enactment of this resolution."

AMERICAN NATIONAL INSTITUTE AT PARIS—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, sometime ago I introduced a bill (S. 2550) to incorporate the American National Institute (Prix de Paris) at Paris, France, which was referred to the Committee on the Library. There has been no adverse report on the bill from that committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEPORTATION OF ALIEN SEAMEN

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to make a request, to which I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I had a visit the other day from a representative of the Department of State regarding the bill (S. 379) to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes, the bill having been introduced by the Senator from Utah. I asked that his views be put in the form of a letter. I ask unanimous consent that at the end of this brief observation the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator's request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 18, 1935.

The Honorable ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I refer to our personal conversation in your office last week, at which time, during a discussion of the bill S. 379, introduced by Senator KING, entitled "A bill to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes", you requested that I send you a letter indicating briefly the views of the Department of State in relation to the bill in question. I accordingly submit the following brief statement.

The bill in practically its present form has been pending before Congress for many years, being urged principally by Mr. Andrew Furuseth, representing the Seamen's Union. The Department of State is heartily in favor of preventing the entry into this country of aliens not properly admissible under our laws and of sending out of the country aliens, whether seamen or not, who are here in contravention of our laws, and it would favor any proper measure for the accomplishment of those purposes which might be found necessary and consistent with our international responsibilities.

As this Department and the Department of Labor have pointed out to the appropriate committees, the bill S. 379 is objectionable from the point of view of our international relations, it would add greatly to the cost of administration, it is unnecessary for the purpose of keeping out of the country seamen not entitled to admission into the United States and the machinery it provides for that purposes is already provided for in more effective form by the Immigration Act of 1924. Both this Department and the Department of Labor have suggested a substitute for the measure which would be unobjectionable from the standpoint of our foreign relations and would increase the effectiveness of existing law but that suggestion has unfortunately not been adopted. I think it is important that you should be aware of the foregoing in the event that it should be sought to bring the bill S. 379 up for consideration in the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FARR SIMMONS,
Chief, Visa Division.

"HOW CAN WE STAY OUT OF WAR?"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR NYE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by my colleague [Mr. NYE] on May 22, 1935, on the subject, "How Can We Stay Out of War?"

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Great and important as are many issues confronting the American people these days, nothing is of quite so urgent standing as answer to the question of "How can we stay out of war?" The experiences of the last war have caused us to vow many times that we would never let an experience like that be visited upon this earth again. The backs of nations are still burdened with the costs of that last experience. As a result of it, nations are quite unable to balance budgets or meet the direct obligations which are upon governments. All in all, experience should be the light followed by civilization these days.

Though we may all feel that everything possible should be done to stay out of that which would constitute repetition of the 4 years of waste and destruction which we know as the World War, the facts are that we have taken few, if any, steps to make more difficult our being drawn into more war. The world today seems to be actually blinding itself to the experience of other days and is being led by a something that causes nations at the present hour to engage in the maddest armament race which civilization has ever witnessed in peace time. Never before has the world, in time of peace, spent as tremendously in preparation for more war as is true at the present time. The record of our own country is one of constantly increasing costs of preparation for more war, with consequent added financial burdens ever since the "war to end war." Today a round billion dollars measures the annual need of our Army and Navy as compared with $341,000,000 in 1915, just before our entry into the World War.

This burden of military preparedness is best described by the assertion that it is costing us more to maintain our Army and our Navy and those preparing for more war each year now than it cost to run every establishment of our Government, including the Army and the Navy back in 1915.

This mad armament race in which we are participating carries with it at once a threat. There has not been a time in all the history of the world when such armament races have been followed by or culminated in anything other than war. The years leading up to the World War found nations preparing even less insanely than they are preparing now in the name of national defense. One man during those years made himself the richest man in all Europe through his program of selling to all Europe the same identical instruments of warfare—always, of course, in the name of national defense. What it led to is now a matter of momentous record. Certainly, experience tells us that it behooves the world, or any nation in this world, to be building every possible barrier against being drawn into more war.

There is no cure-all for war. I have no plan that would absolutely prevent more war and do not know of anyone who pretends to have such a plan. But I do insist that if we will but treat with experience and follow the dictates of that experience there is much that can be done to reduce materially the danger of our country being drawn into more war; and it is these things that I shall undertake to discuss during these brief minutes this evening.

It is altogether fair to look upon international agreements as essential in accomplishing a reduction in the dangers of more war. Understanding between nations is much to be desired and will contribute largely to the elimination of threats of war which are constantly lurking in the path of civilization. But we should face facts, and, if we do, we will at once acknowledge that reduced armaments by international agreement is going to be a long time in accomplishment. Investigation has all too clearly revealed that the armament makers in this world have exercised a powerful influence at disarmament conferences. The record of the pending munitions investigation reveals letters written by those connected with our own American delegation at the Geneva conference to the munitions makers back here at home telling them not to worry about what is going to be done; that nothing is going to be done that is going to hurt their business.

These manufacturers of munitions find large profit in programs which continue these armament races and they are known to actually breed hate, fear, and suspicion among nations to the end that there can be a continuation of the market for their wares. It is not likely that these industries will abandon easily such influence as they have exercised in times past to prevent international agreement. When nations can accomplish the sending of disarmament conferences delegations which owe no allegiance to the munitions business and who cannot be influenced by other than a desire for a continued peace upon earth, then can we hope for international agreement.

These facts, it seems to me, call upon us to make large effort to clean up our own yard here in America to the end that there may be less likelihood of the American makers of armament continuing a power that enables them to influence in any degree any world effort to accomplish peace and understanding. So long as there continues available to them large profit in so-called "preparedness for war", that long will these "merchants of death" do everything possible to prevent any such understanding as would make room for reduced armaments.

American armament makers have actually sought to stir up American fears of other countries to the end that there could be larger appropriations occasioned in Congress for the cause of national defense. One such industry is known to have appealed to newspapers to publish war-scare stories about Japan so that there could be evidence to send to Representatives in Congress of a public demand for larger preparation on our part here in America. Our American munitions makers send their salesmen throughout the world selling American munitions supplies to other nations, including those some consider most apt to be our foes in the event of another war. Of course, selling to these other lands enables them to convince our own Government of the need for larger preparedness through the purchase of like supplies. All in all, this urge for profit has clearly blinded men to the things which their madness leads to, and we in America ought to be strongly insisting upon any and all legislative steps which would take profit from programs of national defense. Whether this can be done by Government regulation of the private industry or whether there must be resort to a program which would have the Government produce its own national-defense machinery, is neither here nor there—we should be insisting upon whatever would remove that vicious motive which has armament makers arming all the world with the same, identical instruments in the name of national defense.

While men are prevailed upon to do mad things to win profits out of preparing for war, it ought to be noted that these same men and interests have learned that there is one thing that pays larger profit than preparation for war, and that one thing is war itself. In other words, there are those who have learned to know that profit in their business flows most freely when blood is actually flowing thickest upon fields of battle. The profits which men cut for themselves out of 4 years of World War is pretty generally known to the American people. The World War created in America alone 22,000 new millionaires, men and women who could not have had those fortunes except as men were bleeding and dying upon fields of battle. It is but natural, then, that there would be those who would today say that "perhaps what this country needs to get out of this depression is another little war." The masses of people will remember that it was war that gave us the depression; but the point I am trying to make is this: That there ought to be resort to such means as will destroy whatever prospect exists in minds today that there can be profit for anyone in the event of another war. I am satisfied that destruction of this prospect of profit would contribute largely in the elimination of danger of our being easily drawn into more war.

Our munitions committee has labored long in the preparation of a bill to take profit out of war and has reported that bill to the Senate. It is pending in the Committee on Military Affairs. In the main, that bill is a revenue bill fixing the rates of taxation to apply automatically with the declaration of war. These rates are so high upon corporations and individuals that all income, so far as the individual is concerned, beyond $10,000 a year would be subject to a tax of 100 percent. There are those who insist that this legislation is too drastic and that men and business are not apt to rally to the needs of their country in the event of war if they are so restricted. To such critics it ought to be said that, while this bill would place heavy restrictions upon incomes, we ought not to forget that war places heavier restrictions upon those who are called into the active service of their country, and no one ought quibble about the sacrifice that will be called for from all in the event of another war.

Attention should also be called to the fact that one of the purposes of this bill is that of eliminating the inflation which large governmental borrowings occasion in time of war. This war-profits bill, had it been in effect during our participation in the World War, would have raised more money than the Government expended during those 2 years to maintain Government and to prosecute the war. In other words, this bill would enable us to pay for war while it was being fought and would not be saddling upon the backs of unborn generations burdens which have not been of their own creation. It seems to me that this is a highly desirable accomplishment.

History records, and will one day soon more clearly record, what things were done prior to our entry into the World War to weaken the American spirit of neutrality. When this history is boldly faced, those who face it are confronted at once with the knowledge that the desire for profit and business prove stronger than the desire for neutrality and the avoidance of participation in somebody else's war. On this question Senator CLARK, of Missouri, and myself have given much thought and have introduced resolutions aimed to strengthen our neutrality laws and make them immune to such influences as were brought into play by selfish hands prior to our entry into the World War. On next Monday night the Senator and I will discuss these issues more at length before an audience in Carnegie Hall in New York. But at this point I should like to refer to the three resolutions as being a very necessary part of any program looking to our ability to stay out of more war. The three resolutions are known as "Joint Resolutions Nos. 99, 100, and 120", and are pending before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, which committee, we hope, is going to give consideration to these measures within the next week or 10 days.

One of these resolutions has to do with the issuance of passports in time of war and virtually requires of people who insist upon entering a war zone doing so at their own risk and without any assurance that our Army, our Navy, and our marines are going to rush to their assistance if they find themselves in difficulties.

A second resolution deals with the exportation of American-made munitions of war to nations engaged in war. This resolution would have the effect of causing those nations that wanted American supplies to come to America and get them and take their own chances in getting them to the destinations desired. This would avoid jeopardizing our commerce and our flag through the carrying of supplies to a belligerent nation and would have the further effect of putting the United States on a cash-and-carry basis as respects other nations which might be engaged in war.

The third resolution, and perhaps by far the most important of them all, is the one forbidding the issuance of credit and loans by any American individual or corporation, including banks, to any belligerent nation or the nationals of any such belligerent nations. When America fully understands the part which credit and loans played in our being drawn into the last war, there will be even larger readiness than already exists for the approval and adoption of this particular kind of resolution.

In conclusion, let me point out that this larger program, aimed at keeping America out of war, is a program which calls upon America for the surrender of nothing which it has, but only that which it might selfishly want if war were to come upon this earth again. It does not weaken in any respect our national defense; rather, it strengthens it by creating less need for the increasing expenditures in the name of national defense. It seems to me that the interest of all Americans could well be afforded in this general cause if Americans are really anxious to avoid that experience of 16 and 20 years ago, which has left us with frightful burdens, many broken homes, many scars, and many wounds as yet unhealed.

"BREAK THE LOG JAM!"—EDITORIAL FROM OMAHA WORLD-HERALD

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the World-Herald of Omaha, Nebr., of June 14, 1935, entitled "Break the Log Jam!"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Omaha World-Herald of June 14, 1935]

BREAK THE LOG JAM

There was a rather dismal picture of new-deal discouragement at Washington painted by Paul Mallon in his report to this newspaper. To a considerable extent it is duplicated by reports from other close observers of the Washington scene, made either through the press or by word of mouth.

Its gist is given in these words, quoted from an unidentified labor writer:

"When I asked them ('the liberal element of the "new dealers"') about present policies, they generally expressed the opinion that these would not do much good. And when I found some particular policy for which they had any hope, they said its value would be only temporary."

There is very obviously trouble and disappointment attending the heroic efforts that have been made to lift the country out of the quicksands in which the incoming Roosevelt administration found it.

It is important for the administration, and for all citizens, whether friends or opponents of the administration's policies, to identify what is at once the heart and the cause of the trouble. We believe it is not difficult to find. We do not believe it is impossible to attack it in a practical and definitely helpful way.

The Roosevelt administration, it should first be recognized, has splendid achievements to its credit.

It assumed an awful responsibility on taking charge at a time when the Republic was near the nadir of fear and despair. And promptly, boldly, successfully, it met that responsibility.

The bank panic was stopped. Our banking system was saved, and the confidence of the people in it was restored. Today the banks are loaded with money and with unprecedented credit facilities that are only awaiting the customers to put the labor and capital of the Nation to work on its inexhaustible natural resources.

National prohibition, that futile attempt to regiment all Americans in their modes and manners, that bestrode the Nation like an Old Man of the Sea, was quickly lifted off its neck.

The rising wave of criminality and lawlessness, carrying gangsters, racketeers, organized and violent defiance of society on its crest, was beaten back and down. What had seemed an insoluble problem, menacing destruction, proved to be subject to solution, once it was courageously and vigorously attacked.

A prostrate and bankrupt agriculture was lifted to its feet, put back on the highway to prosperity, and is today the chief factor in economic revival. Had the effort to accomplish this failed, the consequent disaster would have been incalculable.

The racketeers of Wall Street, the peddlers of phony or unsound securities, who had bilked the people of billions of their savings, were brought under the strict control of law.

Numberless homes and farms throughout the Nation, threatened with foreclosure, were saved to their occupants.

The menace of fluctuating currencies across seas, threatening further deflation and a lower standard of living, was effectively put down by monetary policies that still have saved us a sound currency—the soundest and safest in the world today.

These are among the services that should have sufficed to crown any administration with a shining glory. Logically, they should have resulted in our country leaping forward toward a condition of well-being and progress such as it had never known before.

To the extent hoped for, the extent expected, they did not. While there has been progress, it has been halting and uncertain. The Nation creeps on hands and knees—forward, it is true, but hesitant, fearfully.

We should be able by this time to know rather clearly the reason. The situation can be envisaged by any observer.

The trouble is that more than 20,000,000 of the American people are still on relief, and that the calls for relief do not diminish. The trouble is that millions of once willing workers, able bodied, can find no employment in private industry. The trouble is that the banks and other fiduciary institutions are jammed with money and available credits that can no more find employment than labor can. Nobody wants to "hire the money." If money isn't hired, labor can't be. And so the Government, out of the people's pockets, has to feed the hungry and provide the idle with "made" work. The expense of this is prodigious. The threats of heavily increased taxes to meet it are terrifying to investment, enterprise, extension. Accordingly we are in a preposterous log jam, one that holds back a dammed-up flood of work and enterprise that if released should carry security and progress to every corner of the Republic.

It is an absurd situation, one that shames our national intelligence. President Roosevelt must be able to see it. The Congress must. They must ask themselves seriously what responsibility they may have for its existence, what their duties are toward it.

This newspaper that gave Mr. Roosevelt hearty support for election, that has applauded his many brave and valuable services does not hesitate to express the belief that a very considerable share of the responsibility for a continuance of this situation will rest with the President and the Congress.

The trouble is that American enterprise is scared stiff. To put it bluntly, it is afraid of government; what it may do next; when it is going to put an end to bold experiments, noble in motive, that vitally affect every activity, every industry, every contemplated investment, and cloud the future with uncertainty.

Money is like that. It is cowardly. It goes dead, piles up, of no use to anyone, when it is afraid of the morrow.

And so the problem becomes a very practical one. Assuming that it is desired to save the system of private enterprise, of a free society, it is desirable—indeed, it is imperative—to encourage the citizens to put their money to work. Money at work will put men to work. Money and men at work will provide taxes, rather than absorb them, as public work does. Money and men at work will start business humming, create markets, sustain prices, bring better wages—start the whole economic machine to humming again. It isn't humming now. It is idling on a low feed.

The World-Herald believes in reform, too. It believes in social progress and betterment, in a new and better deal for the masses of the people on whose well-being prosperity must rest. But it doesn't believe in cramming the sinful patient with so many medicines, subjecting him to so many major operations, that the patient will die. Get him well first, give Nature a chance, and then, if he need reforming—as our industrial system has needed and still needs it—proceed with the reforming when he is strong enough to stand the shock.

Increasingly the emphasis is on the need for recovery first. Experience has proved it, is proving it more emphatically day by day. We might double the number of laws, each new law further discouraging private enterprise, and get nowhere. Presently we should begin going backward.

The new deal has come to a critical period for itself and for the country. It can triumph over this crisis, as it has over others. Triumph will consist in actively aiding the breaking of the log jam of private enterprise. Stubbornly to pile it up higher is dangerous, and can end only in calamitous failure.

The administration at Washington can serve itself, and grandly serve the Nation, by bringing to a halt the making of new laws, by giving the country a breathing spell and a chance to find and adjust itself, and by encouraging, in every proper way, American enterprise to put American dollars and American labor to work.

The 20,000,000 still on relief, the billions of idle capital and credit, are the sufficient reason for such a course. They are also danger signals, that he who runs may read.

WHAT OF THIS PROMISE TO SHARE OUR WEALTH?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask the clerk to read in his much more distinct voice, and in his clearly enunciating style a letter which I have sent to the White House. I ask the clerk to read it, and I crave indulgence that it be read sufficiently slowly that Senators may grasp its contents.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the nature of the request?

Mr. LONG. I have merely asked the clerk to read a letter which I sent to the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 22, 1935.

Hon. FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Your last message to Congress regarding taxation of wealth, and expressing disapproval of concentrated wealth in the hands of a few, so far as concerns your promise, presents nothing new, for such was your promise prior to your nomination and election, and even after your inauguration. We are now, and have been, however, as far away from the realization of your promise as though it had never been made or remade, and only the force of your administration has brought about the defeat of the several proposals which have been made to Congress, the effect of which would have written your pledge into law.

Now it may be that your continuous and oft-repeated promise to redistribute wealth, and the equally consistent performance of your administration in suppressing and defeating all moves in that direction, may account for the fact that some of your leaders in Congress are quoted as regarding your message as intending nothing very unusual.

All the words and phrases urging the redistribution of wealth, as used by Jefferson, Madison, Webster, Emerson, and by such lesser lights as myself, are found in your message. Such is the voice we hear. But the hand at the voting throttle, whenever the issue for the redistribution of wealth has come to the Congress under your administration, has operated the same as would the hand of the Astors, the Rockefellers, the Morgans, or the Mellons. Although nearly all of those usually found in the vanguard of the liberal movement in the United States Senate voted for my proposals of May 12, 1933, to limit the size of inheritances and incomes, the voting strength of your administration on the other side gave it a crushing defeat. Nonetheless, on March 5, 1934, when the N. R. A. was in some kind of a public conference assembled, you delivered a speech again deploring the maldistribution of wealth and power, which caused me to direct to you a letter, as follows:

"UNITED STATES SENATE,
"Washington, March 5, 1934.

"Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
"President of the United States,
"Washington, D. C.

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have a copy of the speech delivered by you this morning over the radio. In it you said:

"'We undertook by lawful, constitutional processes to reorganize a disintegrating system of production and exchange * * *. The reorganization must be permanent for all the rest of our lives in that never again will we permit the social conditions which allowed the vast sections of our population to exist in an un-American way, which allowed a maldistribution of wealth and power.'

"Many of us are happy, Mr. President, that you again take occasion to pronounce against maldistribution of wealth in the hands of the few brought on in this country through the means as you indicate.

"We are clearly of the view that you would wish the lawmakers of this Congress to correct the maldistribution of wealth, but possibly there are some who might not be so convinced, notwithstanding your expressions, unless you so advised.

"Can it be announced, in following up your declaration of today, that you would desire this maldistribution of wealth and power corrected by this Congress?

"Assuring you that such a pronouncement made open to this Congress would gladden the hearts of the millions suffering from such maldistribution, I am, my dear Mr. President,

"Yours sincerely,

"HUEY P. LONG,
"United States Senator."

Though such a letter was delivered to you, it received no further mention. We have had two more Congresses since that time. In all of them the proposals made tending toward the redistribution of wealth continued to receive the disapproval of your administration in Congress.

During the past few weeks the Supreme Court of the United States held, as previously stated by me and others, that the legal groundwork supporting most of the activities of this administration was irregular and illegal. The last few days have seen it charged against, and later stated by, your administration that you, for the first and only time in your career, personally and officially commanded and directed the remittance by the Government of a sum of $1,700,000 owed by the Astors, Franklins, and Roosevelt as liquidated and settled damages; that the consideration for such remittance of $1,700,000 was that a new ship should be built by such private interests for their own private account, on which three-fourths of all the money the ship was to cost would be loaned by the Government, all to be guaranteed against loss by the Government with a subsidy mail contract to be furnished to the ship of such private owners by the Government—the same in connection with transactions heretofore ruled to be illegal by the Comptroller General.

We are all politicians; I am one myself. In times of turbulence we look about to see the moves that we may have never intended to make or which we may have considered making later to promote the fortune of persons and parties intrusted to our hands. And so, notwithstanding the fact that 48 hours previously a "share our wealth" amendment had been defeated in the United States Senate, I was not astonished, much less offended, that you should make some pronouncement which would meet with the approval of the public. What should that move be? I should have judged in advance that the effort to excite popular acclaim should not be one of experiment, but should very properly be along such proven lines as had never failed to create a furore of popular acclaim in the hearts of the distressed American people. So, had I been in your place, would I have asked myself, What should that move be? Certainly, placed in your stead, nothing less than the tried and true declaration for a redistribution of wealth, which swung a nomination, then an election, and ever thereafter served failing and waning causes and purposes, would have occurred to my mind.

So, Mr. President, I have more than the usual grounds of acclaiming the message which you sent to the Congress this week. I care not what undisclosed and irrelevant motive may inspire any promise that may be made by one either in or seeking public office if that promise be kept; and I am more than willing—yea, more, desiring—that whatever person in power who wishes to save the lives of 125,000,000 people affected by the maldistribution of wealth, in order that he may save his own political stakes, shall have all glory and all profit therefrom, undiminished.

But, Mr. President, your leaders say that—as was the fate with previous gestures of this kind—nothing is in sight in the way of action over your late pronouncement against concentrated wealth in the hands of the few. Some publications would cause us to believe that, as the promise at the Chicago convention fell one way and performance thereon went the other way, that again your heartening message will lend stimulant to the weakening hearts—also a stir up and down in the stock market—but that food to sustain such stimulation will be withheld. If such be true, the sure death of more is all the more certain.

Now, Mr. President, I would like to encourage you to do two things. They are:

(1) Put the proper force, as you can exert with the turn of you hand, behind the move to redistribute the wealth of the United States, and by this time next week the laws will be on the books and we will be on our road to doing it.

(2) As a result of keeping this oft-repeated promise, reelect yourself President of the United States.

In doing this, I submerge every personal feeling and political reaction which honestly and honorably would affect me.

You will bear in mind that not one vote which I have cast since you were elected President of the United States has been contrary to your pledges made to the people before your nomination and election and sometimes after your election. Nonetheless, because I have voted for what you promised and declined to vote the contrary, though the facts have been heralded to the world that you gave your political control into the hands of those who opposed your nomination, and most of whom declined to vote for you in the election in my State, that matters and counts for naught with me. You can leave your spoils of war in the hands of those who undertook to prevent your successful campaign; you can continue to oppose me in the Louisiana political arena with all the weapons and sinews which your Public Treasury now affords to my enemies; nonetheless, if you will redistribute the wealth of the United States so that every man and his family shall rest in a home owned by them, free of debt; so that each child shall have the right to complete education and training; so that there will be employment and earnings sufficient to guarantee a respectable comfort to all families; so that those who have passed beyond the reasonable age of labor are given a fair pension by the Government—supporting these things by decentralizing wealth and breaking up the concentrated fortunes for which you declare—then every atom of support and strength which I may have is at your beck and call, and loud will be my praises for the good which you may do to this country, even though it be for the keeping of a promise now of extremely long standing, which was made to affect the last nomination and election.

Now, there are many who credit you with having taken over the share-our-wealth movement. Even some say that my use in the undertaking has become emasculated because of your stronger and more capable support, and are even moved to say that the wind was swept from my sails by your pronouncement. I hope that such is true. It helps the political fortunes of one to have it shown that he has spent effort and thereby accomplished the wreck and ruin of persons and politicians who elected him to the offices which he has heretofore held.

I say that because I have heard some say that when you went to unusual courses in the work that spelled doom and exile to the Tammany politicians who made you Governor of New York that you brought many independent people to your support. My elimination from politics would be the immediate and sure result of your enactment of the share-our-wealth legislation. You would thereby have another complete case for the public's admiration, which, cited in contrast with my support of your cause and policies, might give you a measure of added prestige. I assure you that I would nonetheless welcome the general and full result. Therefore, so that all may know, so that the Congress may not further quibble, will you make known now just what your stand is on the following principles of the share-our-wealth undertaking, viz:

1. Do you wish the Congress to limit the amount of wealth one man should be permitted to own, and what is the outside limit you would set?

2. Do you wish the Congress to provide for such a redistribution of wealth as will give to every family a homestead where they may have the fair comforts of life up to not less than one-third the average family wealth in America free of debt?

3. Do you wish the Congress to provide that every family shall have such a share of our national income to live on as will give to every family not less than one-third the average family earning?

4. Do you wish to limit the size of inherited fortunes and of incomes; and, if so, what are the limits you suggest?

5. Would you favor this money being also used to secure every child in a full right to education and training, including the professional or vocational education and training in college?

6. And would you allow this money for the redistribution of wealth to be used so that all those above 60 years of age who have not a fair earning can draw a pension, and in what amount would you fix such a pension?

In case you indicate your favor and desire for one or all of the above, which you need not embarrass yourself to make to or through me, I assure you that, if your cohorts do not desire to do so, legislation for the same will be proposed and submitted to Congress within 48 hours, and your support of the same will secure its enactment before a week shall have expired.

Assuring you of my esteem and thanks for courtesies heretofore or hereafter granted, and with other good wishes, I have the honor to remain,

Your sincere friend,

HUEY P. LONG,
United States Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the letter which I directed to the Chief Executive, a copy of which I presented and which has been read at the desk, I hope will make unnecessary much further explanation from me.

Following the pronouncement of our Chief Executive, several newspaper articles almost require that I should say something with regard to the effect which this pronouncement has on measures which I have advocated here and which I am advocating before the people of the United States in order that the proper support in the States may be had to enact into law several principles which I have proposed. Most of them have been voted on by the Senate from time to time in one form or another.

Mr. President, there is such newspaper comment as this—I have before me a newspaper supporting the present administration, the Washington Daily News of Thursday, June 20, 1935. The headline of that paper reads:

F. D.—

Meaning President Roosevelt—

F. D. tax plan steals issue from "wealth sharers."
Well-timed message is believed to have burst LONG's balloon.
Republicans quick to recognize potency of new challenge raised by President.

There are further articles along that line, to some of which I may take occasion to refer in a moment.

There is likewise such comment as appears in the article I hold in my hand, published in what I should call an anti-administration paper, the Washington Post, of Friday, June 21, 1935. It reads in this way:

The President has lost popularity with left-wing elements. He has been frequently taunted by "Kingfish" LONG for failing to live up to his redistribute-the-wealth promises, and the Louisianan earlier this week let it be known he would make a Nation-wide tour this summer preaching his share-the-wealth gospel. Also, during the last week, President Roosevelt has been charged by a former personal appointee of being partial to such rich friends as Vincent Astor and Kermit Roosevelt.

All these things were mentioned by those who regarded the message as inspired by politics. The President has now cleared his record, it is contended, and has taken the wind out of the sails of the Huey Longs. The reaction on Capitol Hill indicated that the reaction to the message throughout the country should be favorable to the President.

Also, Mr. President, my friend Mr. Will Rogers, writing in the New York Times in its issue of Friday, June 21, 1935, has this to say:

I would sure liked to have seen Huey's face when he was woke up in the middle of the night by the President, who said, "Lay over, Huey, I want to get in with you."

Yours,

WILL ROGERS.

[Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). No demonstrations are permitted in the galleries. If they shall be repeated, the Chair will have to order the galleries cleared.

Mr. LONG. I am sure my friend Mr. Rogers would have considered that his column purchasers owed him additional money if he knew the mirth he had excited in the galleries of the Senate by his article.

I also have before me the Washington Times of Thursday, June 20. The article is headed:

Hot fight due over "share wealth." 1936 campaign issues set in message on taxes.

I do not know whether I shall regard that as a friendly gesture either to myself or to the President, or to Democrats or Republicans; but I am wondering whether there is not some inspired motive for saying that this is the 1936 campaign issue when the campaign promise was made in 1932. So I shall refer to that a little more extensively in the course of my remarks.

Just another mention along this line, Mr. President. I quote from the New York Herald Tribune, which contains a cartoon on its editorial page headed "Castle-Building Substituted for Public Works." If I may describe this cartoon, I will simply say that it undertakes to show castles, one of which bears an emblem attributed to me, and another one an emblem attributed to the President. On one side it carries a mile post pointing in the direction of the castles which says "HUEY LONG's share-the-wealth home for voters. Magic carpet, limited, leaves on the hour"; and at the other entrance it says: "Roosevelt share-the-wealth home for voters. Fairyland express, one-half hour service."

I then wish, just generally, to read a comment from the paper published by the railroad brotherhoods, called Labor, from the issue of June 25. It says this:

"F. D." urges heavier taxes on big incomes, inheritances.

Down in the body of the article it says:

Earlier in the week the Senate had shouted down a share-the-wealth plan offered by Senator HUEY LONG, of Louisiana, and LONG, fearing he could not make a favorable showing, declined to ask for a roll call.

At about the same time the House put through a bill extending the nuisance taxes which net the Treasury a little over $500,000,000 a year. Congressional leaders, who thought they knew what they were talking about, said that would end tax legislation for this session.

Then came the President's message. "In principle" he agrees with LONG that concentration of wealth menaces the political and economic safety of the Nation, but on the question of how far Congress should go at this time, the two men are probably far apart.

I desire to find out, if I can develop it in a moment, whether the President and myself are near together or far apart; that is, what may be the status of the President and myself.

There are some newspapers' comments which I see reproduced in some of the papers which might be pertinent. I read the New York Times comment as reproduced by the New York Herald Tribune. The headline of the article in the Herald Tribune is:

Press comment on Roosevelt's tax-rich plan.
Attempt to steal LONG's thunder seen in surprise message to the Congress.
Political tone is noted.
Plea called social philosophy, not fiscal program.

Then there follows as the first quotation from the press the comment of the New York Times, and the New York Times article states:

It is impossible not to perceive the trail of politics over the President's message on taxation. Mr. Roosevelt himself clearly traces it when he calls some of his recommendations "too complicated and difficult to be debated in the time remaining for the present session of the Congress." That is a pretty plain intimation that he is looking forward to the next session and the next Presidential election. * * *

It is not unfair to infer that he hopes to cut into the political forces behind Huey Long and Dr. Townsend by means of his own more rational proposals. They may not be financially sound, or capable of actual realization but politically they ought to serve very well in 1936.

I skip from that article and read this:

If the issue is carried into the next Presidential campaign—

And so forth. I again wish to ask, and I will develop it a moment later, Is it intended to infer that after going through the blood and rain of 1932 on this issue the newspapers are to be allowed to represent that this is another gesture for a campaign 4 years later with the same warmed-over promise that we had 4 years before?

I have here the Baltimore Sun's comment in this article, as follows:

In general, the President writes in a manner that sets all Washington agog with talk of "redistribution of wealth", and causes HUEY LONG to shout "Amen"! on the floor of the Senate. But the President also writes that "if a government is to be prudent its taxes must produce ample revenues without discouraging enterprise." And that would have caused Calvin Coolidge, if alive, to shout "amen" just as loudly.

I must confess that I have never had the learning or the letters afforded to me to give me the power, which I envy in others, to write with expressions from which duplicate meanings might be gleaned, or in which all meanings may be hidden, and therefore I am not in a position to criticize the comments. My undertaking along this line is in necessarily unveneered and unvarnished language so that all may know and understand what I propose, and what I would do if my bills were enacted into law. So I wish to have my intention well understood, in spite of impoverishment of language, of which I plead guilty, and which I cannot deny.

The Buffalo Courier-Express is listed here as saying the following:

Is a tax program for "wider distribution of wealth", to which HUEY LONG says "amen", a program to evoke support or suspicion of its economic soundness?

Then they list the Oklahoma City Oklahoman with this comment:

If a national share-the-wealth program is illogical and visionary when advocated by a Senator from Louisiana, it can hardly be rendered sensible and meritorious when advocated by the President of the United States.

I have about concluded reading the comments, and I will now come to what has occurred.

When this message came to the Congress I naturally could not help emitting expressions of my approval for the phrases and clauses, and for what the message contained. However much it may have failed to be specific in purpose and intent and how many other reasons, causes, and purposes might have been read into it, different from my own desires, as was indicated by some of these newspapers, nonetheless my illiterate mind found a response in my shout of "Amen"! which came from the heart, indicating that I approved of such clauses and purposes as may have been stated.

The same afternoon, I believe it was, I picked up the newspapers to read the comments of the leaders of the Democratic Party in both Houses of Congress, and I read in the comments as to the positions of our leaders that the message was not taken as an indication that there is to be legislation in this Congress to decentralize wealth, and I read the next day or two that the message is not taken as indicating the intention ever substantially to interfere with the big fortunes of the country.

Today I read further. I see printed in the Washington Post of this date, June 22, that there is a petition being circulated by Members of the Senate who are urging the consideration of the tax desires of the President, and that is what it states the petition contains.

The petition circulated by Senator LA FOLLETTE read simply—

And it quotes the petition as follows:

We believe that the tax program presented by the President to the Congress should be disposed of before this session adjourns. We are willing to stay in session until action is taken upon this vitally important question.

That closes the quotation from the petition. I read again the first clause of the petition:

We believe that the tax program presented by the President.

What tax program presented by the President? There has been no tax program presented by the President. I fear that my distinguished colleagues in this body have failed to read the pronouncements of their leaders, and probably some have not read the message itself.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to say to the Senator that I have read the message itself, and I think I understand it to be a tax program, a program which I have favored for many years, and which I strongly favor now, and I do not think it is quite proper to state that Senators have not read the President's message.

Mr. LONG. Perhaps the Senator can tell me; what is the tax program?

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator cannot understand it from the plain language, then it is useless for me to attempt to explain it to him, and I will not waste my time in trying to do so.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I voted with the Senator as long as he voted for proposals along the line of redistributing wealth, and the only time that the Senator and I have ever been apart in our votes on that issue was when the Senator did not vote for my amendments, one of which was offered as far back as 1933.

My question is, What is the tax program of the President to decentralize wealth? What is it? What are the income taxes he proposes? Does anyone know? If so, I pause that I may be given information, which I cannot glean from the President's message, and I confess it may be due to my illiterate understanding.

What is the tax program which the President presents? What is the inheritance-tax program he presents? What is there in it? What is the tax? I have not seen it. I cannot find it in the press. I can receive no information. And I am not alone, I judge from what I have read in the columns of the newspapers, in my confusion of understanding as to what is this tax program contained in the President's message.

Is it a tax on wealth? We had such a tax pronouncement beginning with 1932. We had such a tax pronouncement in the convention at Chicago in the month of June of that year. We had such a tax pronouncement in other messages which came to the Congress. We had such a tax pronouncement in a speech made by the President on the 5th day of May 1934. We had such a tax pronouncement in a speech made in the year 1933 by the President at Chestertown, Md. We had such a tax pronouncement in a speech delivered by the present President of the United States at San Francisco during his campaign for the Presidency. We had such a tax pronouncement, if I may be permitted to say it, in a speech also made by our candidate for the Presidency, now the President, in Columbus, Ohio.

We had more than that; we had the definite promise of the President of the United States a little over 3 years ago to the effect that the Democratic Party was going to do what was necessary to give the people of the United States an opportunity to "share in the redistribution of wealth." That was in a speech delivered in June 1932, and I am standing here in June 1935.

Mr. President, I hope I shall not offend those who feel as I felt. I should like to know. I am seeking information. I am not undertaking to disparage motives, purposes, or what one may propose. I want to know what is the tax proposal of the President of the United States?

I remember when I came to Washington in 1928. After I had been nominated for Governor of my State, and before I had either been formally elected or inaugurated, I came to the city of Washington and tried to help out my people in a flood-control movement, and when I reached Washington I picked up a newspaper and I read:

Senator Ransdell endorses President Coolidge's flood-control program.

I called my friend, Senator Ransdell, or some one of his aides, over the telephone and I said to him, "What is Mr. Coolidge's flood-control program? Have you got it?" He said, "I have not got it. He has not yet transmitted it to Congress." I said, "What is it?" He said, "I do not know exactly what it is yet." "But", I said, "you are quoted in the newspapers as endorsing Mr. Calvin Coolidge's flood-control program. I want to know what it is. I want to know whether I should endorse it. I want to know whether I should recommend to the Congressmen of the lower House that they should vote for it, but I should like to know what it is." He said to me, "I do not know." And the next day, when Mr. Coolidge gave his program to us, Mr. Ransdell said, "We cannot take this. It will not do. It will wreck the whole country."

So I do not want to be in the position of my illustrious and more learned predecessor in endorsing something I do not know.

I ask again of my learned colleagues—I ask again of those whose science as lawmakers is superior to mine—their knowledge in all of the sciences is far beyond mine—I ask them all, I ask them one and all, I ask them singly, I ask them collectively: What is the tax program for the redistribution of wealth in the United States? What is the program and is there a program?

In order that I might clarify that matter I have written to my friend in the White House—and he is my friend—I have written him a letter, and I have propounded to him just those same questions that were propounded to me on the floor of the Senate. I have propounded to him:

> Do you propose to redistribute wealth in accordance with your measure; and if so, (1) what would you establish as the limit to the size of any individual fortune to be affected by these tax laws?

That is no. 1.

> Shall there be a limit on the size of big fortunes, and what shall be that limit?

That is one of the very respectable questions which I ask of him again.

No. 2 is:

> Shall there be guaranteed to or shall there be otherwise supplied or preserved to the families of the United States any such thing as the home comforts of life up to anything like a third of the average family wealth?

I have very respectfully proposed that as one of my questions to the President of the United States.

What is the third question which I have asked of the President of the United States? I have asked him: Does he wish the Congress to provide any assurance that a family income shall represent anything like a third the average family income, so that all may live in the land wherein enough is produced that all could be fed, clothed, and sheltered?

What is the third question? I have asked him:

> Do you want to limit the size of incomes and of fortunes which can be inherited; and if so, what limit do you wish to prescribe?

That is a very respectable question, as I believe my colleagues will agree.

Then I asked him further: Would he be willing that education might be supplied through the funds we acquire from decentralizing wealth and curbing the big fortunes?

I asked him next: Would he allow this money to be used so that an adequate pension might be paid to all those whose earnings are not sufficient after they have reached the age of 60 that they can live in respectable comfort?

Those are the questions I have propounded. Six of those questions.

I now say to my friend the President, who is my friend—a man who does you no harm is your friend; he has never done me any harm; he may have tried to do me some harm, but he has not done me any harm—so I say to my friend: "Now, if that is your idea, if you wish these things done, if you will answer these six simple questions stating that you want the wealth decentralized, stating what the limit is to be, if your cohorts or yourself do not wish to prepare the legislation, within 48 hours I will assure you that the legislation will be prepared and presented to Congress, and that within less than 1 week it will have been fully and completely enacted into law if you put the support of your administration back of it."

That is the proposal now which I hope will meet with approval in the bosoms of my friends desiring the effective passage of legislation to accomplish what they themselves evidently gleaned to be, and which I hope I properly glean to be, the intent of the message sent to the Congress by the President of the United States.

However, bear this in mind, Mr. President. I introduced a bill in the Senate in 1933. I wish to turn to that bill a moment. Here it is. I presented as an amendment to the revenue bill a bill to limit the size of inheritances way beyond anything like a respectable limit. That was when I was trying to establish something to serve that there should be a policy against an unlimited accumulation of wealth in the hands of one man.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. If the Senator is so capable of limiting the size of inheritances in the United States as a whole, why has he not, as the dictator of the State of Louisiana since 1928, done something about limiting the size of inheritances in that State?

Mr. LONG. We have a law which has been in effect there since 1812.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Yes; I happen to know about that.

Mr. LONG. There are no big fortunes in Louisiana.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. There are no big fortunes in Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It is a fact, is it not, that the Louisiana law with reference to taxation of inheritances does not provide for any increase of taxation upon those in the upper brackets as compared with those in the lower brackets?

Mr. LONG. The Senator asks me that question because he does not know anything about the Louisiana law. I will tell the Senator in a moment what the Louisiana law is. The law of Louisiana is the law of France, and it has been that since 1812.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Does the Senator say that, with all his dictatorial powers down there, and control of all the people in his State, of which he has boasted so many times in the Senate——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have done no such thing.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. That with all that power he has no power to change the law of Louisiana, and therefore the State of Louisiana does not have an inheritance-tax law which compares in liberality with that of the progressive States of the Union?

Mr. LONG. There is no progressive State in our country, or any other country, which has as good inheritance-tax laws as has the State of Louisiana. I will now inform my friend from the State of Washington that he will never have as good an opportunity to learn about that law as he has now. Louisiana has the Napoleonic Code Law. Louisiana has those laws which kept the wealth of France decentralized and which is yet decentralized. Louisiana has what is known as the "civil law of forced heirship"; and had the United States had such a law, as France has had, we would never have had such a thing as centralized wealth in America. Under the laws of Louisiana, beginning with the year 1812, under the code later written for 1825, and under the code later written in 1870, when a man dies he is not allowed to give anybody a big inheritance. The inheritance must go in accordance with the law of forced heirship, which makes all descendants forced heirs, and the fortunes must be equally distributed among all heirs, and the law provides that there shall never be an advantage of more than one-third in favor of or against any heirs.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator explain to me how that breaks up big fortunes?

Mr. LONG. Oh, my goodness!

Mr. BONE. Will the Senator be courteous and yield?

Mr. LONG. Why, certainly I yield. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will now explain.

Mr. BONE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LONG. Let me answer the question already asked.

Mr. BONE. I have not finished the question.

Mr. LONG. All right. Do not ask me two questions now, because I am simple-minded.

Mr. BONE. I am painfully conscious that there may be some truth in the Senator's statement. If a man died in Louisiana and left an estate of $100,000,000, and that estate should be divided among four children, I wish the Senator to explain to the Senate how that would break up a big fortune.

Mr. LONG. I shall be glad to explain the two questions in one. A man never can get $100,000,000 in Louisiana under our law. That is no. 1. No. 2 is that in Louisiana, beginning in 1812, when a man died his property, if he had five children and a dependent mother and father, went into that many parts. When those 7 died, if they had 4 heirs each, it went into 28 parts. When those 28 died, if they had children, it went into perhaps 100 parts. So that the policy of the law established in France, which Louisiana followed, and which the financial capitalists have been trying to repeal for 100 years in the State of Louisiana, forbids, makes impossible the accumulation of any big fortunes in the hands of the few; and the proof of that is that it has never occurred in France; and it has never occurred in Louisiana, and never will.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to ask a question for information. I am interested in what the Senator says about the laws of descent and distribution. Do I understand that a man cannot make a will in Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. He can make a will, but he cannot affect the law of forced heirship by the will. In that regard the will would be null and void.

Mr. HATCH. Property descends in that way?

Mr. LONG. Yes. It has got to go that way. It cannot be affected by will. That law has to be observed. That is the law of France, and the law which Napoleon adopted, or which, in a way, was adopted really before Napoleon—the law that prevented such a thing as the accumulation of surplus wealth in the hands of any one man or any few men.

In order that I may illustrate to my friend, let me say that in the year 1914 I was a law student at Tulane University. I wrote Congressman John T. Watkins, who had been a Representative from the district in which I had lived. He had been a Representative, but he had been taken out of our district, and Mr. Aswell was then the Representative; but I knew Representative Watkins very well and very favorably. I had helped him in a campaign once. So I wrote him a letter in 1914. I had been that day to my law school in Tulane University, where Mr. Charles Payne Fenner had made a drawing on the blackboard showing the law of forced heirship and descent in Louisiana and how fortunes were distributed as a result of it instead of how fortunes became concentrated.

I wrote a letter to Representative John T. Watkins—and if anyone has his files that letter and his reply thereto may be found there—in which I said to him, "The wealth of the United States is becoming concentrated in the hands of the few. Why do you not propose to the Congress of America a law of forced heirship such as Louisiana has and such as France has that will save the United States from the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few?" I wrote him that letter in the fall of 1914. That was 21 years ago. I received a reply from Representative Watkins in which he said to me, in effect, "I agree with all you say; I think you are right, but—" he said, "I still believe that the laws relative to the inheritance of property should be left to the States."

Whereupon I replied to his letter, saying, "That will never correct the difficulty, because any man may domicile himself in whatever State he may choose that has an inheritance tax law to suit him. This is a national problem and has to be dealt with in a national way." Representative Watkins never introduced any bill of the kind, and no one else ever introduced such a bill. As I have said, that was in 1914. In 1916 the Industrial Relations Commission came out with a report, and there it began to become more or less a national issue, and it began to be realized that something had to be done to prevent the wealth from accumulating in the hands of a few people. I wish to show to my learned friends here that this is not a new matter in my life; I would not have them question my sincerity where cause does not exist.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I do not seek to embarrass the Senator.

Mr. LONG. The Senator could not do so.

Mr. MINTON. I do not know a thing about the law of Louisiana or of the law of many other places, but how would the law of Louisiana have prevented the accumulation of the Rockefeller fortune, for instance, had Mr. Rockefeller lived in Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. Mr. Rockefeller during his life time might have accumulated his fortune in Louisiana, but he could not have transmitted it all to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

Mr. MINTON. He could have transmitted it to whatever children he might have had or to his father and mother, if his father and mother had been living then.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. MINTON. It would have been broken up only in that way.

Mr. LONG. That would be one case out of a million. There might be one man who would become so wealthy in his lifetime, but there would not be a hundred, and as to that one the law would guarantee correction.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield for a question.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The impression which is generally abroad is that the Senator is in complete control of the State of Louisiana. Is not that correct?

Mr. LONG. I cannot help that impression, but I will say it is not true.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Just a moment; let me answer the questions which have been asked.

Mr. BONE. I should like some further information on the matter of inheritance taxes.

Mr. LONG. I will give the Senator the information in just a moment, but let me get through with the other questions propounded. I would not have my friends think this is a new work to me. Here is a document that is extracted from the columns of the New Orleans Item of March 1, 1918. That was before I ever heard of the United States Senate in any way that might mean I would be here, and before I ever held any kind of office in the State of Louisiana. It was when I lived in the very fine little city of Winfield, La., which, as everyone knows, is a place to inspire good thoughts and good intentions in most of us. I will recommend to any friend I have who wants to acquire, in a profound way, rational thought in politics that he reside in Winfield, La., for a period of 16 years.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It would hardly be necessary for a person to go to Winfield; one who desired to acquire such wisdom could sit here in the Senate and listen to the Senator from Louisiana, could he not?

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; he does not know whether he is going or coming, listening around here, although what the Senator says might be true in some respects.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was referring to listening to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Oh, while I am speaking; certainly that is true. I made a terrible mistake, and thank my friend, and beg his pardon. I am slow in catching these points, as the Senator knows.

Mr. President, I was saying on March 1, 1918, I wrote a letter to the New Orleans Item, which I should like to read. It appeared in the New Orleans Item on March 1, 1918, and, as this is now 1935, that was 17 years and some months ago. The letter reads as follows:

THE EDITOR OF THE ITEM—

This is one of those "Vox Populi" letters—

The EDITOR OF THE ITEM: A conservative estimate is that about 60 or 70 percent of the entire wealth of the United States is owned by 2 percent of the people. Sixty-eight percent of the whole people living in the United States own but 2 percent of its wealth. From the year 1890 to 1910 the wealth of this Nation trebled, yet the masses owned less in 1910 than they did in 1890, and a greater percent of the people lived in mortgaged and rented homes in 1900 than in 1890, and more lived in rented and mortgaged homes in 1910 than did in 1900. Reports from the Committee on Industrial Relations, appointed by the President, showed that wealth is fast concentrating in the hands of the few.

But the greatest cause for industrial unrest is that of education. Authorities on education tell us that 80 out of every 100 people in the United States never enter high school; only 14 out of every thousand get a college education; 690 out of every thousand never finish the fourth grade in school. Does such a condition give the ordinary man his proper return of the Nation's prosperity? What do you think of such a game of life, so brutally and cruelly unfair, with the dice so loaded that the child of today must enter it with only 14 chances out of a thousand in his favor of getting a college education and with 986 chances against his securing the lucky draw? How can this Nation prosper with the ordinary child having only 20 chances in a thousand of securing the first part of the game?

This is the condition, north, east, south, and west; with wealth concentrating, classes becoming defined, there is not the opportunity for Christian uplift and education and cannot be until there is more economic reform. This is the problem that the good people of this country must consider.

HUEY P. LONG.

I hope my friends——

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. Just a moment. I hope my friends will understand that I considered this problem in quite a favorable light many years ago.

Mr. President, if I may now proceed with my explanation, I proposed in this United States Congress on the 12th day of May 1933 to fix a limit on these fortunes. I proposed that no one should inherit more than $50,000,000, which, I think, was an outrageous limit to set, but that nonetheless we ought to start somewhere with a limit of some kind. I was trying to establish the principle. I proposed that no person should be permitted to transmit to an heir, by natural law, or rather by what we call an artificial natural law, or by will, more than $50,000,000 as an inheritance for which the heir did not work.

I proposed as to incomes that $1,000,000 should be the maximum earning allowed to any man, and above that amount the Government should step in and take practically all of it, if not all of it.

What happened to those proposals? That bill received 14 yeas with 4 pairs in favor of it, making 18, and the nays were 50. That was the vote of the Senate on the outside absurd limit.

I called upon my friends in this body at the time, as my remarks in the Senate will show, and told them this was the promise of the Democratic Party. I showed to my Republican friends that Mr. Herbert Hoover had pronounced in favor of the decentralization of wealth in the last speech he made in Madison Square Garden during the campaign. Nonetheless, I called upon the President's supporters and upon the President himself, and I called upon those on this side of the Chamber, to carry out the pledge which had been made to the American people on the 12th day of May 1933.

What became of my plea for help? Here was the disposition made of it in the Senate of the United State: We had 14 votes in favor of it and 4 votes paired in favor of it, making a total of 18, and 50 votes against it and 4 paired against it, making a total of 54 against it. That is what became of it on that day.

A little later other proposals were made to increase the income taxes and to increase the inheritance taxes. Some of them I proposed, some of them others proposed, but the reason why I was proposing this particular schedule was because a few months after I came to the United States Senate in 1932, I introduced a resolution relating to the then pending bill, known as the first Hoover "balance the Budget bill", the first one I had ever heard of that was called a "balance the Budget bill." The great cry that was heard in the United States in those days was that we had to "balance the United States Budget."

A revenue bill was pending in the House of Representatives wherein it was undertaken to provide for a sales tax, but our forces cut it out of the House bill. Those of us who were at that time fighting for the principle that, instead of having a sales tax which would descend on the backs of the little men of the country, there should be a tax which would go on the backs of the big-fortune holders and the big-income makers, renewed our fight and undertook to reform the bill in both Houses. I think I made the first attack in this body on that scheme.

The leaders on both sides were trying to put through Mr. Hoover's sales tax—the leaders on both sides of the Chamber in the House of Representatives were trying to put through Mr. Hoover's sales tax. We had the Democratic Party and we had the Republican Party trying to put a sales tax on the backs of the people in order to balance the Budget of the United States Government. We had to fight that proposal with the mavericks of all sorts and description, one of whom was myself. We were laying down a regular barrage that we were not going to stand for this concentration-of-wealth disaster to heap upon the backs of the needy a tax to restore the welfare of the country, if it ever was to be restored.

I introduced a resolution, the first one introduced here, providing that the Senate Finance Committee, which at that time was considering the bill, should provide that the income of any man should not exceed $1,000,000 in 1 year, and that no one should be allowed to inherit more than $5,000,000. That proposal was denounced on both sides of the Chamber. That proposal is the reason why the nomination in Chicago went to Franklin Delano Roosevelt. If it had not been for that proposal in that resolution to limit incomes and inheritances, there would have been another nominee for the Democratic Party out of one of the Houses of Congress, just as surely as I am standing on the floor of the Senate at this moment.

That proposal was voted down. About five or six of us voted for it. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] shouted "aye." The junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] shouted "aye." Some five or six or seven of us voted for that resolution providing that the limit of incomes should be $1,000,000 a year and that the limit on inheritances should be $5,000,000 to any one person without working for it.

Soon after that time much acclaim was given to that proposal. It was the only plan proposed up to that time to limit fortunes in America. There was no other such proposal in the Congress at the time. It attracted wide-spread attention. I say again, the only proposal made for the decentralization of wealth was that one, which contemplated also such increases in inheritance and income taxes as we might manage to put into the bill.

Soon after that time our President, or the gentleman who is now our President, and who at that time was not yet the nominee of his party, gave his private and public assurance that he thought something had to be done along that line, and from what he said and wrote, I thought that ought to be done. However, I came back after the election, after the President had declared himself from the rostrum of the Chicago convention, and worked out a schedule and submitted it by which I merely took the taxes then existing and scaled them up to where no earning in excess of $1,000,000 a year was permitted to be retained by anyone. The amendment would have permitted inheritances up into big millions, maybe 50 of them. My resolution of about April 1932 limited inheritances to $5,000,000, but I extended the limit up to where it was possible for a man to have inherited maybe $50,000,000 in the proposal I tried to carry in 1933. But the fate of that bill was that it received an avalanche of Democratic opposition and was defeated.

Later on, on the 5th day of March 1934, the N. R. A. had a meeting, and at the N. R. A. meeting the following was said by the President of the United States in the course of his speech:

> We undertook by lawful, constitutional processes to reorganize a disintegrating system of production and exchange. * * * The reorganization must be permanent for all the rest of our lives in that never again will we permit the social conditions which allowed the vast sections of our population to exist in an un-American way, which allowed a maldistribution of wealth and power.

Mr. President, I wrote a letter, as I have previously shown here, in which I called on the President of the United States to "Come along! Send your message to Congress! Let us have your bill; or, if you have not a bill, will you say to the Congress of the United States that you will support a bill that I have?" I had already introduced one, which had been defeated. Before President Roosevelt's term I had submitted a resolution which had been defeated. Then I wrote him and asked him to come along and support this bill, or send us another bill, but nothing was even heard from that.

Now we are together again. Another Congress has met, and another Congress has adjourned, and another Congress is about to adjourn. Now we receive another declaration in which we are told that the President of the United States proposes that there shall not be any surplus fortunes; but the leaders say there is not going to be any bill. The Congress is going to adjourn. There is nobody who tells us what the inheritance taxes ever are going to be. There is nobody who tells us what the income taxes ever are going to be. There is nobody who tells us what the limit is going to be on the big man's fortune. No one even says there is to be any limit. There is no man who tells us what the guaranty is going to be for the little man, or if there will be a guaranty for him. There is no man who tells us one thing or the other. There is no bill. There is to be no Congress. Everything is to adjourn, and we are to go home and be left with a promise that has stood here before the American people since the year 1932! And then are we to ask them to feel better because someone has hinted at another promise?

Talk about going into another Presidential campaign with this promise! This is either to be done now or the people are not going to be fooled about it another time on the same promise.

I wish to say that I am here ready now and at all times to support not only the bills which I myself have introduced, but I am ready to support the bills that anyone else introduces to redistribute wealth. I am ready to support the President's schedule, or I am ready to support the schedule of anybody else, or I am ready to present my own schedule. If the President will send his bill in here, I will vote for it. If he does not send it in here, and he has someone else or there is anyone else who has a bill to put in here, I will vote for that. If he does not send any, and nobody else sends any, then I have bills of my own. I am asking him, "What is the law you want? What is the law you propose? Is there going to be any law? If you do not want any law of your own direction, will you support one containing these things? If you have a policy, then what are your limits, if you have any limits? What are your purposes, if you have any purposes?"

The only answer we get is an empty gesture that comes in 1932 that "I am in favor of this"; a promise that comes in 1932, from the rostrum of the Chicago convention, that "We will do this"; an empty gesture that comes from Chestertown, Md., that "We should do this"; another gesture that comes from San Francisco that "We are going to do this"; an empty gesture that comes from the N. R. A. conference on the 5th day of March 1934 that "We would be better off if we were to decentralize wealth"; and now, after all that has been done, and they have voted down bill after bill and amendment after amendment, and we have had 3 Congresses and 1 extra session of another Congress, and the present one is going to adjourn, then we come in again—no bill, no law, no specifications as to what we ever are going to have, or when we are going to have anything and use the same verbs and phrases and nouns and pronouns and adjectives that were used 4 years before; and now they say that we are fixing the people up so as to give them some more promises for another campaign 2 years from now! Two more years!

"Just wait awhile. We are going to get around to it. Just sit right there. We are not going to tell you what we are going to bring you. We have not got that figured out yet. We are not even going to tell you exactly what we are going to promise you. We have not got that figured out yet; but we are remaking the promise to share the wealth, and we are going to take the wind out of the sails of everybody else who has a bill or ever has had a bill to spread the wealth that we have been defeating all these years and all these days." Whoever has come here with a bill proposing to decentralize wealth, specifying the means and the purposes and the details of it, is to be emasculated by the empty wind that comes out of the White House. It has been coming out of there every season when it is necessary to quiet a political flurry, according to the dispatches that come in here in these newspapers, if they can be credited or believed.

I do not undertake to assail the President's motives. I do not undertake to assail the President's purposes. I do not undertake to draw any line of support or of opposition to him. I should like to be with the President for a bill. I should like to support the President in the enactment of our law. I would support the President's bill if he has one to do anything. I would rather support the President's law. But if the President has no bill, and the President has no law, then I want to try to get the President either to support my bill or to support somebody else's bill, and to stop the avalanche of a Democratic majority from crushing the life out of every other bill or amendment that comes in here that undertakes to share our wealth and to prevent the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few.

In other words, do not give us this voice of Jefferson and this hand of Mellon any more. We have had the voice of Thomas Jefferson, and we have had the hand of Andrew Mellon. The voice of Thomas Jefferson comes out of the White House just as though he were living there: "We ought to decentralize wealth. We ought to give every boy a chance to be educated. We ought to give everybody a home. We ought to see that every family has earnings enough to live on as long as this country has plenty." That voice of Jefferson has been coming out of the White House for more than 3 years; and at the same time, every time anything gets on the throttle to steer things one way or the other, it is the same kind of hand that Andrew Mellon would have put there; it is the same kind of hand that J. P. Morgan would have put there; it is the same kind of hand that John D. Rockefeller would have put there; it is the same kind of hand that the Astors would put there.

Let us have a bill! The Democratic Party is on trial. The whole administration is on trial. Let us have your bill!

What have been these promises to the American people? I will read from another message from the President of the United States. I do not have to content myself with just this year's promises. I can give you promises that he made in 1935, or I can give you promises that he made in 1934, or I can give you promises that he made in 1933, or I can give you promises that he made in 1932. Just take your choice. Call the year of your choice, and I will read you a promise from any one of the years you wish.

Here is one from 1934. I have read you from 1932, and I have read you from 1933, and I have read you from 1935. Now I will read you from 1934:

> We must dedicate ourselves anew—

Says the President, in the message which he sent to Congress on June 8, 1934—

> We must dedicate ourselves anew to a recovery of the old and sacred possessive rights for which mankind has constantly struggled—homes, livelihood, and individual security.

If you will show me a thing that has got the people any more homes along that line, I want to see it. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation? It may have loaned them some more money, but it placed them in more debt than they already owed. Livelihood? There is more unemployment now than there was when this message came in here. There are more people on the relief roll today than there were when this message came in in 1934.

So, Mr. President, let me make this suggestion: I do not care whether the President takes the Huey Long share-our-wealth idea away from me or not. On the contrary, I would rather he would do it. I will leave every principle for which I have ever fought, from the day I was a country lawyer and before that time, on my front porch or on my back porch while I sleep.

They can be stolen or they can be carried away with my good will and with my commendation for whoever desires to enact them into law; and if I should ever see him carrying them away, instead of yelling "Stop thief!" I will praise him and glorify his name here if he will cause them to be put into law. He need not worry about me. Let him take the things I have stood for; let him put these things into the law; but do not go out here and say you are going to steal a man's clothes unless you want to wear them. Do not go out and tell the people you are going to go to the dance and are not going to help pay the fiddler something. Come in here with the bills! Come in here with the laws! If you have any law, let us have it. If you want a law, tell us what you want. If you do want to prepare a law, let me write one for you, then change it as you will, or let someone else write one for you and pass it. Let us have a bill. Let us not go out here to the American people with this promise that we have made in 1931, and 1932, and 1933, and 1934, and make it again in 1935, and then tell the American people we have no proposal, and we are going to adjourn the Congress of the United States because it takes so much time to study this question.

It "takes time to study the question", does it? How long does it take? I can sit right here at this desk and write every one of these laws in less than an hour's time. The President of the United States, I was told, said he could write them in 30 minutes' time; and I heard another very important official of the administration say he could write them in 20 minutes' time. They can every one be written between now and tomorrow morning. It does not take any time; it takes votes. We do not need any time; we need votes. That is all we need here; and the man who has them, or can give them to us, is the President of the United States, if his administration goes with him and stands back of his program, as it always has and always will. We do not need laws; we need votes. That is all we need. All in the God's living earth we need is two-thirds of the votes of the Senators on this side of the Chamber. That is all we need. Give us two-thirds of the votes on this side of the Chamber. If you will give us just two-thirds of them, we will get enough votes on the Republican side to put these laws into effect. I do not think you will have a desertion of a third, or a fifth, or a sixth, or a seventh, or an eighth, or a tenth, if these laws come in here to be enacted, carrying out the President's pledge and with his backing.

As an answer to these newspapers and to these editorial writers and to these political wiseacres who say that the assumption of the President of the United States of the share-our-wealth policy means the elimination of me in politics, to those who say that if Roosevelt champions the Huey Long share-our-wealth program he thereby eliminates me from all political life, let me say that he could not do me a greater favor nor could he do anything which I desire nearly so much as to eliminate me from the political arena of the United States and of the State of Louisiana. The day a law shall be enacted that will decentralize wealth, when every man will have work to do, when every family will have a home, when everyone will have the things he needs to eat and to wear and the shelter to cover his head, in a land oversupplied, the day that condition comes to pass, my use in the American public life will have ceased, and nobody quicker than I myself will tell the American people that I am a useless article in the United States Senate. That day I will proclaim I am positively worthless to the further cause of the American people; from the day wealth is decentralized, from the day when the big fortunes of this country are broken up, and there is guaranteed to the man at the bottom a living; that day I will not be needed in the public life of the country, and that will mean my sure elimination—oh, that it would hasten in coming!

Mr. President, I said this much in a book which I once had to write. Others were writing so many books about me that in self-defense I finally had to write one about myself—and I may say that I never made any money out of it. In that book I said this, and I will close by saying it again; it is found on the last page of the book I wrote, page 340:

> In 1932, the vote for my resolution showed possibly a half dozen other Senators back of it. It grew in the last Congress to nearly 20 Senators. Such growth through one other year will mean the success of a measure, the completion of everything I have undertaken—the time when I can and will retire from the stress and fury of my public life, maybe as my forties begin—a contemplation so serene as to appear impossible.

Mr. President, I quote that from this book. If there shall be a fulfillment of that undertaking, which began with the very beginning of my public life, and even before that, if there should be a fulfillment of that one undertaking, if that decentralization of wealth shall come about, no one will be so happy and so contented in my retirement from public life as myself, none so gladdened that at last, in a land flowing with milk and honey, everybody will have enough to eat, everybody will have clothes to wear, and all the comforts of home and shelter over their heads. God speed that day!

(During the delivery of Mr. LONG's speech he secured permission to have printed at the conclusion thereof certain interruptions, which are as follows:)

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The Senator states that the reason why the State of Louisiana has not changed its laws in reference to inheritance taxes is that there is no possibility of large inheritances in the State of Louisiana. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG. That is one thing. Does the Senator want me to tell him something else? If so, I will say that in my term as Governor I did propose to raise our inheritance taxes, but, through the influence of newspaper editorials against it, I was not able to raise them. The contention was made that it was not necessary to do so in Louisiana by reason of the laws we had. However, for the Senator's information, I will say that I proposed, as will be verified by the journals of the House of Representatives of Louisiana, even higher income taxes than Louisiana had.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. If the Senator will yield for another question——

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. My understanding is that during the time the Senator was Governor of Louisiana he did not have complete and absolute control over the legislature.

Mr. LONG. Nor have I now, either.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The Senator has freely stated here that he can go down to Louisiana and call the legislature in session, and that a law will be passed as he wants it.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will find that, I will give him $10.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It is a fact, is it not, that the Senator goes to Louisiana repeatedly and calls the legislature into session and writes the bills and conducts the proceedings on the floor of the legislature?

Mr. LONG. That is not so, either.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It was very commendable of the Senator, I think, in 1918, as a private citizen, representing "vox populi", to be interested in the redistribution of wealth at a time when he had no influence of any sort on legislation, and I think that it is very commendable of him to come here to the Senate——

Mr. LONG. I do not yield for a speech. The Senator can make a speech in his own time. If he has a question to ask me, that is all right.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I am going to ask a question.

Mr. LONG. I do not yield for anything but a question. If the Senator has a question to ask, I am glad to yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. My question is simply this: Why did not the Senator during the period of time when he had the power as he had power, in the State of Louisiana, do something about the redistribution of wealth by the passage of a law providing for a capital levy in that State, by the passage of a law providing for an income tax, by the passage of a law providing for old-age pensions? The Senator asked the President about old-age pensions.

Mr. LONG. Just a moment. Is that the question?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Why did not the Senator do something about some of those problems in his own State instead of coming here and talking about them in the United States Senate?

Mr. LONG. For the Senator's information, I will say that I wrote the income-tax law of the State of Louisiana. That is answer no. 1.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. What were the increases?

Mr. LONG. Just a moment. I want to get through with the various questions the Senator has already asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana refuses to yield further.

Mr. LONG. When I became Governor of Louisiana I found a constitution containing inhibitions against an income tax, which prevented the enactment of such a law without the constitution being amended. My predecessor, Mr. John M. Parker, the Roosevelt leader in Louisiana at this time—but who did not vote for Mr. Roosevelt in either the primary or the general election—was the Governor when there was held the constitutional convention which wrote into the constitution of Louisiana an absolute prohibition against a man ever being taxed on his income where there was anything to show that he paid any other kind of a tax. In other words, there could be none. So, in order to put an income-tax law on the statute books of Louisiana, I had to go into the Legislature of Louisiana and first secure a constitutional amendment, which required a two-thirds vote in both houses and then a majority vote of the people. We continued that effort in that State for 6 years until it was finally passed by 68 out of a hundred vote, with only 1 vote to spare, in the house. Thus we managed to have submitted to the people of Louisiana an income-tax law. Such a law today is on the statute books, and this is the first year of the income tax. That is no. 1.

Now as to inheritances. Because there are no concentrated fortunes in the State of Louisiana and cannot be, because of the best laws of inheritances in all the world, the civil law, taken from the Napoleonic Code, which will not permit concentrated fortunes. They are not practicable, feasible, possible, and cannot be accumulated by will or otherwise.

No. 3: We did propose unsuccessfully an increase in the inheritance taxes of Louisiana while I was Governor of the State of Louisiana. The newspaper editorials will be found which were potential in securing the defeat of the effort. Not all the laws I have proposed in Louisiana have been enacted, Mr. President, but nearly all of them have, I am glad to say, in one way or another, and I hope, for the good of the State, more of them will be enacted in the future.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LONG. I yield for a question only.

Mr. BONE. I merely wish to ask for information about the tax matter.

Mr. LONG. I yield for a question, but please do not take my time.

Mr. BONE. I do not want to take the Senator's time, but I want information.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. BONE. The proposal the Senator has made here relating to Federal taxation, of course, would put all the money into the Public Treasury. Will the Senator tell me how if a man in Louisiana, for instance, a man like John D. Rockefeller, should leave $500,000,000 to a son or to two sons he could possibly by such a transaction in that State put any money into the Public Treasury where it would be useful for public purposes; in other words, it would not be taxed if he left it to his children in Louisiana, and that would not break up the fortune; it would merely be passed on to children.

Mr. LONG. It is hardly possible under the Louisiana law.

Mr. BONE. That is what I wanted to get clear. I hope I am not doing the Senator an injustice.

Mr. LONG. It is hardly possible under the Louisiana law to do it. It is not possible under the law of Louisiana, and it would not have been possible under the law of the United States, if we had had these laws in effect for 50 years, for a man ever to own more than one or two million dollars under any circumstances. It could not have been done. It would have been impossible.

Mr. BONE. Why?

Mr. LONG. Because of the laws of forced heirship and descent, except in extraordinary cases. France is the only example I know of.

Mr. BONE. But the Louisiana law does not take the money. The man can pass it on to his heirs.

Mr. LONG. I do not want the law to take the money if I can help it.

Mr. BONE. Oh, I thought the Senator did.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no. I want the law merely to take the money so it may be distributed into the hands of all the people. I had rather have the law make its own distribution than to have the money brought into the Government's hands. The United States would be far better off today if, instead of having sat silently by and by overt acts brought about the calamitous condition of the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few, on the contrary it had diffused the wealth through the years. We then would not have had any such problem as faces the country today, and the country that did it has not such a problem today.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator From Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LONG. No; I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

After the conclusion of Mr. LONG's speech—

FARMERS' HOME CORPORATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2367) to create the Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy, to engage in rural rehabilitation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOORE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Capper	Glass	McKellar
Ashurst	Caraway	Gore	McNary
Austin	Chavez	Guffey	Maloney
Bachman	Clark	Hale	Metcalf
Bailey	Connally	Harrison	Minton
Bankhead	Coolidge	Hatch	Moore
Barkley	Copeland	Hayden	Murphy
Bilbo	Costigan	Holt	Murray
Black	Davis	Johnson	Neely
Bone	Dickinson	Keyes	Norbeck
Borah	Dieterich	King	Norris
Brown	Donahey	Logan	Nye
Bulkley	Duffy	Lonergan	O'Mahoney
Bulow	Fletcher	Long	Overton
Burke	Frazier	McAdoo	Pittman
Byrd	George	McCarran	Pope

Russell	Smith	Tydings	Wheeler
Schall	Steiwer	Vandenberg	White
Schwellenbach	Thomas, Okla.	Van Nuys
Sheppard	Trammell	Wagner
Shipstead	Truman	Walsh

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 20, line 3, after the word "shall" to strike out the words "have power to", so as to read:

(e) The Corporation shall select, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, or agents as shall be necessary for the performance of its duties under this act, within the provisions of the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1933, as amended.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I thought it was very generally agreed when this bill was previously under consideration that the Corporation should be left free, so far as its attorneys and experts were concerned, to employ them without regard to civil service.

I share the views of the Senator from Minnesota with reference to the other employees; but it is my judgment that so far as experts and attorneys are concerned the Corporation should be left free, and not be required to employ them through civil service. If the pending amendment does not have that effect, I hope the Senator will write it in such a way that it will not necessarily apply to attorneys and experts.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, there may be merit in what the Senator says. However, why should not an attorney come under the civil service? We have them under civil service in other departments of the Government. We have attorneys who are under the civil service and are rendering good service.

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that I have observed a good many efforts on the part of departments to secure attorneys through the civil service. I happen to know that some departments have been very seriously handicapped by reason of the fact that they were required to secure attorneys through civil service.

I share the Senator's views with reference to the clerical employees; but I believe it is not in the interest of the civil service, nor in the interest of the public in general, to limit any agency to its employment of attorneys through the civil service agency. It is impossible for a board here in Washington to look over the papers prepared by a man and determine whether or not he is qualified to act as an attorney.

I happen to have made investigation with reference to one effort to obtain attorneys, and I chance to know some of those who stood high and some of those who stood low; and at that time I reached the conclusion, so far as I was concerned, that until some different method of selecting attorneys by the Civil Service Commission was possible of adoption, I did not favor the selection of attorneys through civil service. I believe the Corporation can obtain attorneys who will better perform the required service if it is not limited by their records, as they appear on paper.

For instance, I happen to know that a man who had had a great deal of experience as a clerk in certain capacities was rated very high on the civil-service list as an attorney. I know other lawyers who had had practical experience, not necessarily directly on the identical line desired, but who could have rendered expert service, who stood so low on the list that it was impossible to employ them.

I certainly hope the Senator from Minnesota will not insist upon including attorneys in his amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There is merit in what the Senator says. Will the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] accept such a suggestion?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am in accord with the suggestion of my colleague. I think attorneys ought to be excluded.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Would it be sufficient, in the opinion of the Senator from Alabama, if we should strike out the word "attorneys" in line 5?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator ought to strike out the word "attorneys" on the amendment; not in the bill. The amendment which the Senator offers includes the word "attorneys."

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest, as the language to be inserted, "except attorneys and experts."

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Minnesota is looking at the language in the bill; is he not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have not the printed amendment before me.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator were to strike out the word "attorneys", the Corporation would not have any specific authority for the employment of attorneys.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why not put in the amendment, after the word "employees", the words "except attorneys"?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. How would it do, in line 5, to put in the word "except" before the word "attorneys"?

Mr. BLACK. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota, instead of the way he has his amendment written, that he use language such as this:

The Corporation is authorized to appoint attorneys, and, subject to the civil-service law, such officers, examiners, other experts, and employees as may be necessary for carrying out its duties under the act.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That will carry out the intent.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand the language offered by the Senator from Alabama does not make it mandatory, as desired by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BLACK. I do not understand the question.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Minnesota desires mandatory language that the Corporation shall employ agents and employees under the Classification Act of 1933. As I understood the language of the Senator from Alabama, it is only discretionary language which he now suggests.

Mr. BLACK. No, Mr. President; I was not changing the Senator's amendment at all, except where he proposes the appointment of officers, attorneys, and so forth, under the civil service. I was leaving the word "attorneys" out of the group and placing it up above, so as to provide:

The Corporation is authorized to appoint attorneys and, subject to the civil-service law, such officers, examiners—

And so forth—exactly as the Senator has it in his amendment. If that amendment should be adopted, the only difference would be that in the appointment of attorneys it would not be necessary to appoint them subject to civil service. It would not at all affect the remainder of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In my opinion, the word "shall" should be used, rather than the word "authorized."

Mr. BLACK. I was reading from the amendment the Senator offered.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not offering the printed amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I thought the Senator was offering his printed amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am proposing to amend the bill by striking out in line 3 the words "have power to" and substituting the word "shall."

Mr. BLACK. The language would then be "shall select."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. "Shall select."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the sentence would then read:

The Corporation shall select from the civil-service list employees—

And so forth. Why not insert after the word "employees" the words "except attorneys and experts"? How would it read then? I think that would cover what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I suggest that the Senate proceed with its consideration of the bill; and meantime, if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] will join me, we will prepare the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am a little curious to know why the Senator desires to make the provision mandatory. Why is not the Senator satisfied to give the Corporation authority to select such officers, agents, and attorneys as it may deem necessary, and select from the civil-service lists such of them as may be prescribed in the bill? Why make it mandatory? Is it not sufficient to authorize the Corporation to select such officials as it may need?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wish it to be certain that it shall be done. That is the reason why I am offering the amendment.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe that any Federal agency which is set up will not appoint a great many agents and attorneys and a great many employees? In fact, they will be limited only by the amount we appropriate; and here there is no limitation as to the amount which shall be devoted for the payment of salaries of employees, nor as to the number of employees. So it is not necessary to say that the Corporation shall name attorneys and agents, because they will do it anyway. I should be very glad to see a restriction that they should not appoint too many, and limit the number; but we cannot do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are the provisions of this bill to be permanent?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have created a great many temporary projects for which we are providing civil-service appointments. We are going to have so many civil-service employees that they will be a long time without work if these places shall ever be abolished.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am very desirous of having the civil service apply to every service of the Government, except the heads of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have now probably 100,000 employees working temporarily. If they are all under civil service, what are we going to do with them after their temporary service shall have ended?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if I may have an opportunity to confer with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], I shall present the amendment a little later.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest that the Senator withdraw his amendment for the moment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I withdraw my amendment temporarily.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 26, line 21, after the word "land", it is proposed to insert the following language:

Or judgment for tort or a statutory offense or for contractual obligations in which enter the elements of fraud or deceit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have talked with the Senator from Illinois about that matter, and also with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who was responsible for this part of the bill. The amendment is acceptable to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. McNARY. Of course, it will require confirmation by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not understand the Senator's remark.

Mr. McNARY. I said the acceptance of the amendment will require confirmation by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly it will have to be approved by the Senate. I merely said that it was acceptable to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. McNARY. Very well; but I have not located the place where the amendment is to come in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment comes in on page 26, line 21.

Mr. McNARY. What is the insertion?

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, the bill as now drawn allows a $2,500 exemption, and makes it a covenant running with the land, in the case of any lien the holder might place against it or for any judgment on account of debts. The amendment simply means that in the event of a judgment for a wrongful act the $2,500 exemption shall not apply.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am still unable to locate the place where it is proposed to amend the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment comes in on page 26, line 21.

Mr. DIETERICH. At the end of section 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the information of the Senate, the clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 22, line 21, after the word "land", it is proposed to insert the following: "or judgment for tort or a statutory offense or for contractual obligations in which enter the elements of fraud or deceit."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the clerk to read the amendment into the bill with the context of the bill, so that we may know how it will be coordinated with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

This provision shall not affect the lien of the Corporation for the money loaned for the purchase of the land or equipment for the land or judgment for tort or a statutory offense or for contractual obligations in which enter the elements of fraud or deceit.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. I understand the purpose of the amendment is to subject the homestead or the homesteads that may be created under the bill to judgment for tort or fraud or for deceit or for some statutory or criminal offense.

Mr. DIETERICH. That is correct. The provision as reported gives the particular landowner a greater exemption than he would get under the State law. He is given an exemption of $2,500. The amendment, proposed to be inserted following the text of the section which provides that the exemption shall not affect the lien of the Corporation for the money loaned, merely provides further that the exemption shall not apply to any judgment for tort or any wrongful, willful act of the purchaser of the land.

Mr. BORAH. I cannot understand what the Senator desires to accomplish by this amendment.

Mr. DIETERICH. I will try to make myself clear to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. It has been difficult to hear what has been said.

Mr. DIETERICH. Section 5 now provides, among other things, that—

No land purchased from the Corporation herein created up to the value of $2,500 shall ever be encumbered with any lien or obligation, either statutory or contractual. Such land shall not be subject to any debt, or debts, or obligations of any kind of the owner, except taxes.

Then it is provided that this shall be a covenant running with the land. The amendment simply provides that the $2,500 exemption shall not apply against a judgment for tort or a statutory offense or a judgment in which enter the elements of fraud or deceit. It is evident that the provision as it now stands gives greater exemptions than are allowed by most States.

Mr. BORAH. I think I understand what the Senator desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to know if there are any other amendments of a minor character to be offered? If so, we may dispose of them this afternoon. I should like to make such progress as we can. I understand, however, that there are some amendments, such as the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], which is supposed to be intended to emasculate the bill, which should go over until Monday.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, and hope the Senator from Alabama will accept it.

I send the amendment to the desk. It comes in at the bottom of page 16 after the word "otherwise."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 16, line 25, beginning with the words "or otherwise", it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "forestation", in line 2 on page 17, as follows:

Or otherwise made available for rural rehabilitation, and prevention of soil erosion, reforestation and forestation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Alabama that the amendment proposes to strike out two or three items, including reforestation, rehabilitation, and soil erosion. I am inclined to think that the rehabilitation work ought to be transferred to the corporation created by this act; that such corporation should be given supervision of it; but I do not think that the soil-conservation work should be transferred to this institution; and I do not think that the money appropriated under the relief act for soil conservation should be transferred to this Corporation. The plans now under way are separate and distinct, and are under different organizations. I have discussed that phase of the matter with the regional manager for Texas and Oklahoma. I am particularly concerned with soil conservation. A large number of Senators and Members of the House waited on the Secretary of Agriculture and urged him to request the President to allot as much as $150,000,000 for the next 2 years to be devoted to the prevention of soil erosion, the amount to be taken out of the $4,800,000,000 appropriation. Following that, a large delegation of Senators and Representatives waited on the President urging him to set aside $150,000,000 for the next 2 years for use in connection with soil conservation. Up to date only $25,000,000 has been set aside for that purpose, and 90 percent of the work has to be done by those on the relief rolls.

In my judgment, the Soil Conservation Service is the most important work the Government is undertaking. I think that is indispensable; I think it has sense in it; I think the result will justify the effort if it is managed with judgment and prudence.

I do not know so much about this proposed legislation. I sometimes fear it may break down the whole social and economic structure in the South. The tenantry system, while it may have many evils, is a system that does exist, and whatever does exist has reason for existence. It is the result of the play of economic forces. It is easy to tear down an existing system; it is not so easy to set up another system in its place. I think the enactment of this bill may have the effect of tearing down the existing tenantry system. I am not certain that it will succeed in substituting another system in its stead. It may mean ruin for both.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is the hope of some of us, at any rate, who are supporting this proposed legislation, that it will destroy at least some features of the present tenant system. It is our belief that there is necessity for that sort of policy.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate that.

Mr. ROBINSON. The tendency during recent years has been to put the cultivation of land in the control of tenants. The tenantry system has grown so rapidly that it has assumed an alarming aspect. I do not see how the effort to put people on land the ownership of which they are to acquire so as to provide homes for themselves can possibly accomplish a destructive or harmful result. Of course, it may cause inconvenience to some persons, but the aim is very desirable.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the aim; it is humanitarian and benevolent; it has all the virtues of a golden dream. I hope it will have some of the virtues of a reality, although I doubt that. The existing system is a matter of historic evolution and development. All the existing economic conditions and all the economic forces in operation have brought it about. It has evils that ought to be corrected. They ought to be corrected, however, in pretty much the same way, as a matter of evolution and development. I am not certain that we can artificially clap down just any sort of system on any community and have it work with any degree of success. I do not think we can. Human society is rather an organism than a machine. We cannot mold and remold it into any form like sculptor's clay. I did not mean to embark on this phase, but I feel certain that this scheme will prove a bitter disappointment to the Senator from Arkansas and others who are sponsoring it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I do not expect revolutionary results from this bill should it be enacted and carried into effect. I think there are some who have an erroneous opinion as to what may be expected as the result of the legislation. There are some who think it is contemplated that all persons who are not owners of homes shall be afforded an opportunity to acquire farm homes. Manifestly that is an impracticable policy. The object of the pending legislation, as I understand, is to afford a process of selection under which those who are believed to possess the capacity and the disposition to build and maintain homes may have an opportunity of doing so through the assistance which the Government would be able to afford by virtue of the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. President, I think I agree with the Senator from Oklahoma in the implied statement he made that there are a great many persons who may be regarded as possible beneficiaries under the measure who will never be able to acquire farm homes under the terms of the legislation. That is true for various reasons. There are some persons who are so shiftless, so improvident by nature and by training, that even though the most liberal opportunities should be afforded them they would be unable to avail themselves of them. I think we may just as well recognize that fact.

But in spite of all such considerations there is a large number of individuals who are capable of availing themselves of the opportunities afforded by the bill who would promptly demonstrate their capacity to pursue such course in the management of their own affairs as that some such provision might be given them as would result in their ownership of homes. To my mind, as I said when the bill was before the Senate on a former occasion, that is one of the most helpful purposes that any legislation we could enact might be calculated to accomplish.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not sure that I wholly understand the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I shall state it in a moment.

Mr. McNARY. If it should result in aiding progress in the great work of reforestation, I should be inclined to support the proposal made by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I do not believe that moneys set aside for soil conservation and reforestation ought to be transferred to the corporation created by this measure, because they are in charge of different bureaus and in charge of those who are especially trained for that purpose.

Mr. McNARY. Inasmuch as this is a very important matter affecting, as it does, the work of different bureaus, I ask that the amendment may go over. I understand the Senator from Arkansas desires to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that. I should like to have Senators examine the amendment and look into it.

While I am on my feet I wish to make one further observation in regard to what the Senator from Arkansas said. It is difficult to help some people without rendering them helpless. That is a peculiar reaction in human nature. Sometimes it tends to change the sturdy oak into the clinging vine. I am not insensible to the defects in our system of tenantry. I think these evils ought to be corrected. Part of these evils have become chronic. Part of our system is imperfect. There are many, many instances where the sons of farmers, who intend to follow farming as a vocation, engage temporarily in tenant farming or rent land temporarily as tenants with a view ultimately to acquiring a home—a perfectly normal process, a healthy process. But there are some who fail in that endeavor and who can never realize that purpose.

I also appreciate the fact that it is harder to help the tenant farmer than any other class, because, however good his character, he is without resources or he would not be a tenant. He does not have the basis of credit; he cannot borrow; he cannot finance himself. He cannot prime the pump. He cannot get off his back. He cannot start. There is the trouble. I realize that this scheme is to enable him to get up steam and to get under way. But I doubt if we can build a house, fit it with furniture, and equipment of that sort, and hand it over to someone as a sort of turnkey job and expect him to appreciate it and make use of it as he would if he had by thrift and economy, self-denial, and self-reliance, laid some sort of foundation upon which to erect this superstructure.

I think it is the duty of Government to maintain conditions of fair competition so that our citizens may engage in the struggle for existence, and may engage in the struggle with a reasonable prospect of success. I think the Government ought to remove obstructions, artificial and even natural obstructions, which lie in the pathway of the citizen, which stand between him and success. The duty of Government is to maintain conditions under which the people can survive and succeed, removing obstructions, maintaining opportunity so the man who tries may triumph, if I may say so.

That is one philosophy. The other is that the Government should go further and should do more than adopt a negative policy, providing opportunities under which the struggle for existence may be waged with a reasonable hope of success. Some believe the Government ought to go further, that the Government ought to render affirmative help, that the Government ought to do for the citizen what ordinarily the citizen ought to do for himself. As I remember, Jefferson himself was pretty particular on that point, and said that the county should do nothing for the individual which the individual could do as well or better for himself; that the State should do nothing for the county or the individual which the county or the individual could do as well or better than the State; that the General Government should do nothing for the State, county, or individual which the State, county, or individual could do as well or better than the General Government.

I still believe that self-denial, self-reliance, and self-respect are the virtues which made this country great, are the virtues which made America great. I still believe that those virtues, and those virtues alone, can keep America great.

It is said that conditions have changed, that circumstances have altered. Of course that is true. It is said that new conditions have given rise to new problems. Of course that is true. It is said that new problems call for new solutions. Of course that is true.

But may it not be equally true that the spirit which solved the old problems may still be the best spirit with which to solve the new problems, and even though new solutions may be required, that after all those solutions rest upon the same principles and must be inspired and guided by the same virtues as of old?

I still think that the law of gravity is almost as efficient as when our fathers came to the wilds of the New World. I still think that the multiplication table has some reasonable precision in its results and is as sound a principle for our computations in solving new problems as in solving old problems.

I still have some respect and reverence for the Ten Commandments as embodying at least the rudiments of morality and of ethics; and I am not certain that the "new day" has brought principles which can with any degree of safety be substituted for the principles which guided our fathers in founding this Republic.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which is a modification of one that was offered heretofore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota offers a modified amendment which will be stated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask for its consideration now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me say that this is the amendment which we had up before, providing for civil-service examinations.

Mr. KING. I understand it, but I am inclined to differ from the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Utah desires the amendment to go over.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that is satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota, I suggest that that be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 20, beginning at line 3, it is proposed to strike out all of the first sentence of subsection (e), and in lieu thereof to insert the following words:

The Corporation is authorized to appoint attorneys, and shall, subject to the civil-service laws, employ such officers, examiners, and other experts and employees as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act, and to fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

Mr. KING. I ask that the amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its labors today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday, and that after today no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes on any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chairs hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, from the Department of Agriculture I have procured information which I regard as valuable in the consideration of the pending bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD as a part of today's proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1935.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Attached is a table based on the 1930 Census, the latest data available for all States, showing the average size and the average value of farms.

With a little more time it would be possible to adjust the average value per farm for changes in land values down to March 1935, as shown by our land-values index.

The data are also available for a few States on the basis of current releases issued by the Bureau of the Census. To compile these also would require a little more time, but it is uncertain as to whether the data for only a few States would meet the requirements in this instance.

Sincerely yours,

C. W. KITCHEN,
Acting Chief of Bureau.

[1] This number represents in part a duplication, in that both commissioner loans and land-band loans are in a large number of cases on the same farm. Hence the actual number of farms upon which Federal loans have been made is less than this figure of 987,614.

	United States Census, 1930
	Average size of farms	Average value per farm—land and buildings
	Acres
United States or total	156.9	$7,614
Alabama	68.2	1,952
Arizona	742.7	12,999
Arkansas	66.2	2,261

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1935.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As per your request by telephone, I am transmitting herewith the estimated acreage held out of cultivation due to operation of the adjustment programs for the crop years 1934 and 1935. The estimates for the crop year 1935 are only rough approximations. These figures do not include estimates for sugar where producers are operating in accordance with marketing quotas set up under the Jones-Costigan Act.

	1934	1935
	1,000 acres	1,000 acres
Wheat	7,700	5,100
Corn	13,030	12,000
Cotton	14,548	12,600
Tobacco	612	582
Peanuts	(1)	(2)
Rice	190	190
Total	36,080	30,472

[1] No program. [2] No reduction effected.

Very truly yours,

F. F. ELLIOTT,
Chief, Production Planning Section.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, since the receipt of these communications the following memorandum was sent to me this afternoon from the Secretary of Agriculture:

The Rural Resettlement Administration, by reference from Secretary Wallace's office, has telephoned the following rough figures on the present number of farm families on relief:

End of March 1934 (estimated), 600,000.

Present time on account of drought (estimated), 1,000,000.

It is expected, however, that, since the drought is now on the down trend, shortly there will be approximately 800,000 farm families on relief in the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

NOMINATION PASSED OVER—POSTMASTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOORE in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alice L. Woolman to be postmaster at Coweta, Okla.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is not present. I ask that that nomination go over until the Senator may be here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Richmond B. Keech, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. I ask for favorable action on the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc, with the exception of the nomination of William E. Emick to be postmaster at Temple City, Calif. I ask that that nomination be retained on the calendar and go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination referred to will be passed over; and the remaining nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the Army nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Army nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Pursuant to the agreement heretofore entered into, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, and under the order previously entered, took a recess until Monday, June 24, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

MONDAY, JUNE 24, 1935

(Legislative day of Monday, May 13, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Saturday, June 22, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 131) providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8554) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1935, and June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 7205. An act to amend the Ship Mortgage Act, 1920, otherwise known as "section 30" of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920, to allow the benefits of said act to be enjoyed by owners of certain vessels of the United States of less than 200 gross tons; and

H. R. 7652. An act to authorize the furnishing of steam from the central heating plant to the Federal Reserve Board, and for other purposes.

CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS CAMPS IN TENNESSEE

Mr. McKELLAR. I submit a resolution and ask to have it read. It merely calls for certain information from the Secretary of the Interior, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 159), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, respectfully requested and directed to furnish the following information to the Senate:

1. How many C. C. C. camps there are conducted by the Department of the Interior in Tennessee;
2. The personnel of the central office or offices in Tennessee, with the residences of each of the personnel and salaries paid;
3. The personnel of the several camps, together with the residences of each of such personnel, with salaries paid; and
4. The number of boys in each of said camps from Tennessee and the number from outside States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

PRODUCTION, TRANSPORTATION, AND MARKETING OF WOOL

Mr. ADAMS and Mr. STEIWER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 160), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas wool is one of the major agricultural products of many sections of the United States and is used in many industries and provides a substantial part of the commerce of the country; and

Whereas proper methods of marketing wool are essential to the establishment and maintenance of the prosperity of the industry; and

Whereas existing methods of marketing the wool crop have proved unsatisfactory to the wool producers of America: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a special committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the production, transportation, and marketing of wool. The committee shall report to the Senate, not later than the beginning of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

INSPECTION OF NAVY YARDS, ETC.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 161), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof duly appointed by the chairman of the committee, hereby is authorized to visit for the purposes of inspection United States navy yards, air stations, and other naval activities between July 15 and December 31, 1935, the expenses incurred in pursuance hereof, not to exceed $3,000, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] be assigned to service on the following committees: Education and Labor, Immigration, Naval Affairs, Post Offices and Post Roads, and Mines and Mining.

UNITED STATES MUNITIONS INVESTIGATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR NYE

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered over the radio on October 3, 1934, by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] on the subject of United States Munitions Investigation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We are coming to learn that, after all, war may not be as unpreventable as pictured. Fast forging their way to the front are facts indicating that war and preparation for war are in many respects not much more than incorporated murder, with the makers of the machinery of war the incorporators.

However far-fetched the foregoing statement might seem, it is not an exaggeration to say that the manufacture and sale of the munitions of war is an unadulterated, unblushing racket—a world racket of large proportions overshadowing completely the rackets of which we have so many. This one is none the less obnoxious because of the partnership of governments and officials in it.

I say these things not at all thoughtlessly, but only after much deliberation of the results of 3 weeks of public hearings by the Senate committee investigating the munitions industry. These 3 weeks of hearings have seen industrialists, capitalists, and salesmen under oath telling cold-blooded stories of what they have done for and to our Government and for their own enrichment. These have been the stories of men calloused to a degree that finds them defending programs and policies which cannot do other than revert, in the event of our country's entry into another war, to the injury of our country, our flag, and those who will rush to their defense. The committee listened daily to men striving to defend acts which found them nothing more than international racketeers bent upon gaining profit through a game of arming the world to fight itself. So successful has been the racket of these industrialists to create and satisfy the desires of nations for an adequate national defense that they virtually have the world marching straight to the hell that another war will be. And the whole motive behind this is what? Not patriotism! Not love for one's country! Only profit, profit, profit.

In preparation for this broadcast I have waited to refrain from expressing heated conclusions. But I'll swear that no one with other than ice cubes in his veins could have heard the testimony and seen the facts which have been made of record through these 3 weeks of hearings and refrain from speaking his mind in no uncertain way. Truth as respects the munitions industry is so simple, as truth always is simple, that there cannot well be any hedging in speaking it.

Let it be understood that in speaking tonight I do not undertake to speak for the Senate committee, for I am here only as one who heard the testimony from the lips and records of leading representatives of the American munitions industry. As chairman of the committee I could not now ignore the splendid cooperation which has been devoted to the ascertainment of the facts by the entire membership of that committee. Not once has there been any indication that any part of the committee was averse to ferreting out the whole truth. I think no congressional committee has ever served as unitedly as has this committee investigating the munitions industry, and it is my wish to pay compliment to my committee colleagues, Senators GEORGE, of Georgia; VANDENBERG, of Michigan; CLARK, of Missouri; BARBOUR, of New Jersey; BONE, of Washington; and POPE, of Idaho. We were especially fortunate in our choice of a staff to coordinate the findings of a larger staff of accountants and research men, and to Stephen Raushenbush and his assistants we owe large credit for the results thus far accomplished.

What the hearings thus far reveal is but a scanty part of the whole story that will be told when the study of the industry is finally completed. Hearings will be resumed early in December. Continuation of the work after January will depend upon the wishes of the Senate respecting the appropriation of more money to complete it.

Though the investigation thus far has but scratched the surface, it has removed scabs and revealed nasty sores to the light of day where all the world may observe the grave symptoms of a disease that now and then assumes proportions threatening civilization in its entirety. That disease is commonly called "war." Many have looked upon it as one of the incurable diseases, a plague which mankind must tolerate. Now we are given to see that this plague is often man-made, its causes traceable in instances directly to men. I venture to guess that the munitions investigation (the first of its kind ever dared or undertaken anywhere in the world) is going to leave fewer doctors declaring the disease incurable and become the education and experience which will find many more doctors looking to the development of remedies and the elimination of filthy breeding spots which will at least lessen the danger of renewal of the disease in plague proportions. Indeed, we may even hope now for segregation, control, and cure of the disease.

The investigation has brought forth painful yelps from some individuals and groups. Some governments and more officials have complained of the committee's program and policy, have said that the study was not sufficiently observant of the niceties or diplomacy at all times, and that the committee has tread upon toes without the exercise of proper discretion, caution, and guard.

An investigation of the arms question without treading upon official and semiofficial toes would be no investigation at all. Of necessity we have had to deal with the secret courses pursued by the manufacturers and sellers of instruments of war. For years these makers and their salesmen have been weaving their way into governments, deceiving, frightening, corrupting as their welfare and profit dictated. Because of the manner in which they have woven themselves into the very frabic of governments, the industry has won a status of sacredness and secrecy which has enlarged in its opportunity to thrive in a way to return good profit to its owners. Rackets thrive best when nourished by dark secrecy, and when governments lend hands to the racketeers the sky is the limit as respects the flow of profits and blood money.

I repeat that there is no racket to compare with that of the sale of munitions of war. Governments have fought, at great cost, the beer, liquor, white slave, dope, and kidnap rackets. The munitions racket, one whose victim is all civilization, has governments as its partners, unconsciously on the part of governments, perhaps. Doubly difficult, then, becomes the task of destroying or controlling the racket—a racket wearing the cloak of respectability by reason of its association with and in governments.

That such a partnership exists is one of the clear conclusions growing out of the present investigation. It must, therefore, be apparent that nothing short of wide and sweeping disclosures of the truth will ever awaken the world to a degree that will win reform to check the mad race now on toward more war. It is my sincerest hope that the pending investigation may be permitted the time and money to develop the whole truth, however embarrassing it may be to governments or individuals.

I cannot undertake to tell all that has been developed by the investigation of the munitions industry to date. But let me recite some of the disclosures which are not to be denied.

That the munitions industry knows no flag is well revealed by their partnership and working agreements with industries and individuals swearing allegiance under different flags. The Electric Boat Co., of Groton, Conn., maker of Uncle Sam's submarines, sells its patents and designs and license to manufacture to, among others, Vickers in Great Britain, who build Britain's submarines. Between them there are agreements as to the division of the world into sections in which each may sell, agreements involving the sharing of profits, with the once mystery man of Europe, Sir Basil Zaharoff, seemingly the master mind in the very profitable game of arming countries against each other with the same instruments and secrets of combat. While Zaharoff may once have been a mystery man, he stands naked of mystery today and is known now as nothing more than a man whose great wealth has come through his ability to cash in on the hates and suspicions of nations, an ability greatly aided by the honors which competing nations and rulers have bestowed upon him.

The great American Du Pont concern, considered the industry which will be of greatest utility to our country in the event of another war, has its tie-up with the great Imperial Chemical Industries of Britain and with like institutions in other lands. Between them is constant exchanging of secrets in the development of instruments intended to give one country an advantage over others in the event of war. During the course of the hearings 2 weeks ago a spokesman for the Du Ponts undertook to justify their sales and profits during the World War by painting a frightful picture of the purposes of Germany and the great cause of the Allies. He didn't hesitate in agreeing that had it not been for the Du Pont service to the Allies, the United States might very easily today be a German province. There was much of irony in the disclosure the following day that the Du Ponts had entered into contracts which would make their products available to Germany, just as there was irony in the confession of the American Electric Boat Co. that it was American patents that entered into the building of the German submarines which did our American cause so much damage during the World War.

The investigation has revealed that the munition industry employs spies in foreign armies to learn of new developments in armaments, not for the benefit of their own country but for their own benefit in producing and selling like supplies to all the world. That the munitions industry has organized and sponsored war scares to the end that markets might be created for the supplies from their laboratories and shops is very definitely a part of the record of the investigation.

Most revolting is that part of the record revealing that our makers of munitions do not refrain from selling to both sides engaged in a war. Some of them sell to governments which are trying to put down rebellions and, at the same time, to the rebels who are seeking to overthrow the government, as in Cuba.

In this connection the armament race between Peru and Columbia offers a tale most revealing of munition makers' advantage through government cooperation. Not so long ago Peru decided it wanted a more adequate national defense, a desire that the munitions makers had no small hand in creating. Peru appealed to the United States for help in providing this national defense, and we sent to Peru a commission of experts made up of admirals and commanders of our Navy. As a result of this cooperation, Peru bought some submarines from the American Electric Boat Co. A little later, Peru's neighbor, Colombia, grew fearful about this show of military strength. Colombia was sure it needed a national defense against such armament as Peru had annexed, and the Colombian officials appealed to the American Navy for help in planning a national defense of its own. Again Uncle Sam graciously responded and sent a naval expert to that unhappy country to advise with them. Recommendations were made for a plan of defense against submarines, which recommendations again reverted to the advantage of armament manufactures. This story reveals only one of many instances of the part which governments and munitions makers play in starting and then maintaining armament races between countries.

The committee investigation reveals the munitions makers to be spending fortunes in maintaining lobbies to urge armament programs, and the correspondence of these industries shows millions of dollars being paid for commissions and bribes to public officials and those who stand close to public officials.

The record of the investigation contains evidence of the effort made by the munitions industry to block embargoes, make difficult the accomplishment of agreement in disarmament conferences and of their disregard of treaties. We know now that when our country issues an embargo against the shipment of arms to the Chaco, for example, the American manufacturer arranges that business goes on as usual.

To me the most repulsive of all the testimony taken during the committee hearings was that revealing the part our American military forces take in demonstrating and helping to sell American-made munitions to other countries, countries perhaps which might some day be our foes in war. Heads of our Army go abroad and, according to the record, recommend American-made munitions and improved methods intended to make these foreign military forces better fighting units. Our generals, so the record stands, even participate in the recommending of the height of collars to be worn by the soldiers of foreign armies.

In 1928 a number of American naval vessels were equipped with a new type of gun, which, it was presumed, was giving our Navy a great advantage. The gun was the product of an American concern, sold to the Navy at a splendid profit, of course. But this gunmaker was having difficulty in selling the same gun abroad. One day the good ship Raleigh, one of the American ships equipped with this new gun, showed up in Turkish waters. On board, with the consent of the Navy, came the salesman of the American gun manufacturer and officers of the Turkish Navy. The guns were demonstrated for the benefit of these foreign officials and the American manufacturer won a fine order for like guns for the Turkish military forces. Shall we say our Navy is a salesman's sample case?

I am sure that before this investigation is finished there is going to be large appreciation of the gravity of commercial situations which finds our military patents, secrets, designs, and specifications available to and peddled all over the world. Surely there must already be appreciation, as a result of investigation disclosures, combined with previously known facts, of the huge profit flowing to those who make and sell the things entering into national-defense programs and the waging of war. These costs and profits constitute a burden upon civilization which grows heavier year by year.

One American aircraft producer is shown with an original capital investment of $1,000. Largely through the cooperation of naval experts and engineers, this company developed an air-cooled engine. In 1926 this company enjoyed 100 percent of its business from the United States Navy. The returns from this venture down to and including 1932, on the basis of the $1,000 investment, was 1,143,725 percent, and this is not inclusive of the capital increase in the value of the original 5,000 shares of stock. Who but the Government was responsible for this great profit? Be it remembered that this gain is a peace-time accomplishment.

The 4 years of the World War paid another American munitions concern something more than an average of 100 percent per year upon its investment. This war profit paid its executives handsome salaries, millions in bonuses, and annual dividends averaging about 50 percent per year. With the balance the corporation went looking for investments which would be profitable. By reason of its war profits, that company today owns or controls scores of lesser corporations. In such corporations in which it has made investment of $200,000 or more in each, it now has a total investment of well over $350,000,000. Only a small part of this could be theirs but for the fact that they reaped rich profits from the conflict that was taking so many lives. While the blood flowed most freely upon the fields of battle their profits rolled in the larger.

We have learned that foreign missionaries can be and are very helpful in the sale of the munitions of war. The president of one American munitions maker has a missionary brother down in South or Central America who delights in demonstrating his brother's products to generals and ministers of war, and advising on the best means of sales. In this case, encountered by the committee, it is difficult to determine just which is this man's side-line, his work as a missionary or his work as a bomb salesman. I am happy that experiences of this kind are very clearly not the rule, but the exception, in the missionary field.

Missionaries, Government officials, Army and Navy officers, international affiliations, smuggling and spying, cash commissions, teasers and bribes, the breeding of fear and suspicion, the growth of national defense into threatened offense, take these, piece them together, each in its place, and we have the picture and machinery which men paint and build to enrich themselves through the sale of munitions of war. Little wonder, as my colleague, Senator VANDENBERG put it, "Little wonder Peace walks on crutches." Yes, indeed; little wonder that the cause of peace remains a constant invalid while war and threat of war struts in greater health than it has ever known before.

Now we begin to understand how and why this world, only 15 years removed from the last terrible war, with all its consequent burdens and sorrow, is spending more money getting ready for more war than it ever spent in peace time before. We begin to see why our own country sets the pace in this preparedness game by having increased its annual military maintenance costs since 1913 by 197 percent, while Italy, Great Britain, France and Russia have ranged from 30 to 44 percent. Now we learn a little of what is behind these everlasting and annual programs of loud national defense talk. Now perhaps we see more clearly that this mad race in armaments is pushed and encouraged by those who profit through the sale of armaments.

Do the facts uncovered by the investigation anger you as they do me? It is but natural that they would, because we and our children must foot the bill. It goes against the grain when we discover that the cause of national defense the world over has been seized upon as the disguise of greedy hands bent alone upon winning profit—profit which is the greatest when blood flows thickest.

Well, what are we going to do about it? Were time mine, I should willingly tell what I see as possible means of remedy. Those means must needs deal with the taking of profit out of war and preparation for it. The most effective way to do this is to make the Government the sole munitions maker and to write now, not after we've gone to war, law which will fix the rates of taxation to apply upon incomes automatically with a declaration of war. Make these rates double existing rates on incomes up to $10,000 and 98 percent on all income over that amount. Do that and then observe the number of jingoists diminish; see then what strength will come to effort to stay out of war; do that and then enjoy seeing those who profit from them paying the costs of wars in a larger way.

If we fail utterly to curb the munitions industry, let us resign ourselves to continued programs of arming boys with guns to defend the country against foes our industrialists have armed with like guns, with gas masks to defend themselves against the gasses our munitions makers have made and sold to other lands and with steel helmets to protect the heads of the boys against shrapnel and shell our profit-hungry manufacturers have sold to our possible foes.

It would be unfair to say that munitions makers were wholly responsible for wars, for they are not. But it can be said with large justification that the danger of more war can be very greatly reduced by simply removing the element of profit from preparedness and the prospect of any profit for anyone from war.

CURB ON WAR PROFITS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR NYE

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD an address delivered over the radio on April 15, 1935, by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] on the subject "Curb on War Profits."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Strange contradictions confront the world. These contradictions would be less difficult of understanding were it not for the fact that they arise in the face of firm contrary resolutions of such recent making as to cause us at times to wonder if we are in our right minds. Indeed, there is an abundance of evidence disclosing that civilization is of unbalanced mind. Perhaps it is unfair to thus indict all people of the world. It might be that only the leaders of this age are deserving of that classification. But at once we are confronted with the question, "Who makes and keeps these leaders, if it isn't the people?"

In any event, we find a world of people unalterably opposed to more war and convinced that another war would be the undoing of more races than one. There is wide acceptance of the belief that the world could not possibly carry the burden of another war. Yet, though this belief exists, the governments of these people are madly racing in preparation for more war. Only a few years since the war to end war we find all the powers with larger military budgets than were ever known in peace time. Our American increase in military expenditure has been greater than that of any other land, and we will next year spend on our Army three times as much as we were spending the year before we went into the "war to make the world safe for democracy and to end war."

I stand with those who want to see our country amply provided with such preparation as will find us with an adequate defense against attack by foes who would make so bold and foolish as to attack our shores or borders. Plainly, any preparation beyond that ceases to be "national defense." Those who constantly harp about the inadequacy of our national defense are no more satisfied with our defense of today than they were with our defense in 1915, when we were spending but a third of what we are spending now in the name of national defense. Next year we will spend on preparedness for war more money than it was costing the United States in 1914 to run all its establishments of government, including the Army and Navy. Who will answer, when will our defense be adequate?

As a matter of fact, the issue of national defense has become the disguise of profit-hungry men who like nothing better than these armament races between nations. Arming a nation and the world has become a racket that either does not recognize the consequences or remembers that war pays their racket better returns than does national defense.

When a year ago the Senate authorized an investigation of the munitions industry, few dreamed that the study would result in the flood of disclosures unearthed. For nearly a year the committee named to conduct the inquiry has labored, conducted something more than 100 public hearings to make record of its findings, and is now about to report in the Senate its findings, along with legislative recommendations having to do with one particular phase of its study. This does not mean that the investigation is about completed. Much work remains to be done and will be approached as fast as the committee can afford the means and time necessary.

In the public mind the investigation has been primarily one of war-time profit of those industries engaged in the production of war machinery. The actual duties of the investigating committee have been concerned with much more than that. A very large part of its consideration has had to do with the peace-time profit and activities of the same industry. And that consideration has brought conviction that it is quite as important to take profit out of preparedness as to take profit out of war.

For instance, who can recall during the past 10 years the advent of the annual military appropriation bills that was not preceded by a small or large war scare? The appeal is at once made for more adequate preparedness to defend ourselves. As a result, Army and Navy budgets have grown steadily until we find ourselves supporting billion-dollar military programs in times when we cannot balance budgets.

The annual scare about war between Japan and the United States proves very profitable to some. Incidentally those who profit are generally found selling war supplies to Japan as well as to the United States. The munitions racket sells to one and all alike. And in this racket the arms makers have the cooperation of their own Government. Our Army and Navy, for instance, help American armament makers accomplish sales of their supplies in other lands, and officials of our military declare this to be good policy. They say what comes to this: We must encourage larger foreign use of American-made national defense items, so that the American industry can have the capacity to produce what we need if and when those nations to which we have sold decide to use our own instruments against us. However, the munitions racket is not so impressive as when it engages in furnishing munitions for both sides engaged in armed conflict.

One American munitions firm recently sent its salesman, a Mr. Jonas, to Cuba, with instructions to sell munitions to the rebels who were trying to overthrow the Cuban Government. For such sales this salesman received a handsome commission. But a better commission prevailed for him when he sold the same sort of supplies to the government that was trying to put down the rebellion. We can readily understand what this salesman meant when on the day after Christmas in 1933 he wrote another salesman as follows:

"We certainly are in one hell of a business, where a fellow has to wish for trouble so as to make a living. It would be a terrible state of affairs if my conscience started to bother me now."

Mr. Jonas expressed it well. It is a hell of a business, a business that has no room for conscience. The private business of making and selling munitions is one warranting tremendous regulation if not destruction. At least it is time that people were awakening to what probably is largely influencing the mad armament races under way today.

Look at the maddest of all peace-time naval races between our own country and Japan! What might be behind that? Is it possible that the private shipbuilders have any hand in provoking it? Two weeks ago one shipbuilder was made to admit that he had written and urged a newspaper publisher to print stories about the danger of war between Japan and the United States so that there could be newspaper clippings to send to Members of Congress who were slow in approving the appropriations for more and more ships for our Navy.

Assuredly such disclosures warrant programs looking to the control and regulation of this private racket in peace time. Perhaps it calls for the stamping out of this private industry and for Government manufacture of its own national-defense machinery.

But at the moment the committee is confining its effort quite alone to legislative means of taking profit out of war, and it is that to which I wish to devote my remaining minutes tonight.

Does America want to take the profit out of war? If we really want to accomplish that prevention, I believe it possible, and if we do that I am sure that we will at once accomplish large prevention against our being drawn into more war.

The World War witnessed the creation of 22,000 new millionaires in America alone. Individuals and corporations reaped lavishly of profit, while our boys were giving their all in trenches for cause of flag and country. Eugene Grace of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, for example, awarded himself a bonus of $2,800,000 in addition to his salary during the 2 years we were engaged in the World War. It is not easy to forget who is having to pay the bill of the Bethlehem company for war supplies, a bill that included this private bonus for its president. Nor can we forget that it was this same corporation that helped meet the cost of sending a man to Geneva disarmament conference to wreck the chance of accomplishing any measure of disarmament.

To keep the record straight, let us review a few of the gains which corporations enjoyed as a result of 4 years of war. Before me are figures showing the average annual profit during the 4 years preceding the World War, compared with average annual profit during 4 years of war for a list of American corporations. The Republic Iron & Steel Co. saw its profits grow, as a result of war, from $4,000,000 to $17,000,000 a year, while General Motors climbed from $6,000,000 to more than $21,000,000, United States Steel profits jumped from a peace-time average of $105,000,000 to $239,000,000 during the war, while Bethlehem Steel was moving its profit from $6,000,000 to $49,000,000 a year as a result of war. This same comparison shows the Du Ponts, with an average peace-time profit of $6,000,000 and an annual average war-time profit of $58,000,000.

The profit of the Du Pont Corporation for the 4 war years shows a return upon invested capital of more than 400 percent. Other corporations made even larger showings. Individuals enriched themselves while the world was afire and without defense against those who were reaping profit.

To prevent repetition of that experience is no small task, yet I believe the Senate Committee has on its way a legislative program that will largely turn the trick. Starting on Wednesday the committee will write up its program in legislative order, and it hopes by early next week to have its bill before the Senate for consideration.

In light of the disclosures which the investigation has developed, there is in Congress much proposed legislation to take the profit out of war. This is a splendid sign, and indicates a large will to meet the challenge. A week ago the House of Representatives passed and sent to the Senate the McSwain bill as a proposal to take profit out of war. This bill provides for licensing industries and would fix and freeze prices with the declaration of war, using as a base the average prices prevailing during the years immediately preceding the war. At once one is struck by how this program would have worked had it been in effect when the United States entered the World War. The war had been on for 2 years, and our American price structure had reached high. American industry could have wanted nothing finer than a guaranty of the prices that prevailed during those years just before our entry into war.

The Senate Munitions Committee believe that the House bill is quite inadequate, and that it will fail to protect us against repetition of the frightful practices and costs that prevailed during the last war. The bill which our committee is proposing entertains an entirely different approach. The devices of our proposal are: First, taxation; second, a draft of industrial management; third, commodity control; fourth, control of finances and credit during war; fifth, power to commandeer necessary production.

Let us consider these various devices in their order. The first, that of taxation, is aimed at the cause of excessive profit. Excessive profits are really the effect of a more profound cause, namely, the inflation which always accompanies war. In other words, high prices do not produce inflation; rather inflation produces high prices. Therefore, it is upon us to stop inflation.

If high prices is not the cause, what is the cause of inflation? Inflation proceeds from the method of financing war. War is a great business, and as soon as it begins, a tremendous new industry is called into being. There is at once call for vast munition production, costing billions. In the last war we did not even try to pay for these things, instead we borrowed the money to meet the cost. In the war we spent $33,000,000,000. Of this we borrowed $22,000,000,000. Out of every $10 spent to fight we paid $3 and borrowed $7. Most of that we borrowed is left for our children to pay.

That $33,000,000,000 poured into our economic machine produced inflation. Out of this flood, workers were paid. They in turn spent their larger returns in peace-time avenues for luxuries as well as necessaries. This stimulation brought new competition to the war-time industry; labor became scarce, prices and earnings rose, executives and managers boosted their own salaries. Then workers demanded higher wages and there followed higher prices, larger profits, and more wage demands. And finally this vicious spiral reaches inflated proportions which naturally invite an economic wreck.

The only way, then, to stop inflation is to stop the borrowing and pay for the war as we fight it. If there must be another war, let us, when we send our men into battle, prepare to meet the bills as they come. That can be done only by taxation. And since we are select in choosing the best, youngest, and healthiest to do our fighting in time of war, we should be equally select in levying the taxes to meet its cost, and those most able to pay should bear the brunt of the taxes occasioned by war.

The legislation which the Senate committee proposes provides a tax upon incomes starting at $500. The bill steps up the rate of taxation so that those earning more will contribute proportionately more in paying for the war. The bill provides a tax of 100 percent upon all income in excess of $10,000 per year after all taxes are paid.

As for corporations, our committee proposal fixes a very heavy war-time tax. No effort is made to limit the profits of a corporation, but after the profit is made it is subject, under the pending bill, to severe taxation. That tax would be 50 percent of the first 6 percent of the profit and 100 percent of all profit over 6 percent.

One cannot study taxation without knowing that corporations and individuals, with their highly paid lawyers and accountants, have learned many ways to escape tax laws. Consequently, we have found it necessary to write into the bill provisions to stop every conceivable device which the experts might resort to to get around the law.

Had the provisions of this bill been in effect during our 2 years' participation in the World War, the income of the Government would have exceeded the expenditures without the necessity of borrowing a penny through the sale of Liberty bonds.

The next device in the bill is the industrial management draft. It does not provide, as some would have you believe, for conscription of man power or labor. It reaches only those captains of industry who so often in the last war engaged in schemes to hold up, defraud, and cheat their Government.

As to the commodity-control features of the bill, these provide for the closing of commodity and stock exchanges and the abandonment of all price speculation during war.

Critics say that if you do away with the profit motive or reduce it, you will not be able to get money to finance the war industries. We need not worry about that. In the last war the Government had to finance these industries, and will have to do it again. Therefore, we have set up in our bill a finance-control commission to meet these needs.

Finally, recognizing that there were strikes of capital during the last war, our bill provides strong powers for the Government which will enable it to commandeer plants and operate them during the war.

Roughly, I have summarized the provisions of the Senate committee's pending bill to take the profit out of war. The objectives, I believe, will be strongly endorsed by every American. Yet some, while seeming to endorse them, are unknowingly or deliberately misrepresenting the purpose of the committee and its bill. Opposition is to be expected. Fantastic, yet laudable, reasoning will be resorted to in an effort to preserve for greed the privilege and opportunity which war has given.

One writer calls the program which I have here outlined "syndicalism, socialism, and communism." The crack-down artist of business says that this plan is but a scheme to use a war emergency to destroy the profit system and shift the country over to communism. Another writer of larger reputation and responsibility declares this program to take the profit out of war a scheme to make the greatest war machine the world has ever known, a program playing into the hands of any war party.

Criticism of the program is invited and expected, but I do wish critics would know what they are talking about before they undertake their declarations. It would be well if they would read the bill before undertaking to tell what is in it. Calling the bill communism will hardly register with people who know that Communists are not in the least interested in regulating the profit system. The real Communist wants nothing quite so much as a war with the same old unrestrained, mad, selfish, grasping after profits that existed during and after the last war. He believes—and I think he is right—that if such a thing were to happen again, this system would destroy itself without a bit of aid from the Communists.

Another objection raised is that the proposed bill will not prevent war. No one ever said it would. I wish such a bill could be written, but I recognize the causes of war to be many and progress against these causes to be slow. Yet I am firmly convinced that if we remove the profit from preparing for war, and then destroy in every American mind the prospect of profit from more war, there will be far less danger of war. A first result will be far fewer the numbers who today are saying, to no one's good, "Maybe what we need to get out of this depression is another little war." Seemingly people forget that the last war gave us the depression, and that another might easily destroy our civilization.

This very day has developed the most surprising of critics of the bill. For years Bernard Baruch has been talking about taking profit out of war. For days he appeared before our committee urging drastic programs to accomplish this. Some of us wondered why he withheld endorsement of the proposal to provide a constitutional amendment which would give Government in time of war the same power over property that it had over life. He insisted that the Government already has this power, in spite of the fact that property dictated the terms when the Government asked its cooperation during the last war.

Today Mr. Baruch issues a statement to the press hedging on the position he took when he was before our committee some days ago. According to his newest statement, he has discovered that our committee plan would take the profit out of war—not just a little of it but practically all of it. Now he says the bill is too drastic; that we would be defeated in another war under such legislation because business wouldn't do its share of fighting and helping to win the war when its profits were so restricted.

May heaven preserve us!

I've expected someone to say that. But, Mr. Baruch, I never expected it to come from you.

So American business won't produce what is needed in war if it can't have its profits! So American business will not go into a war on the same basis that the boys go in when they are called!

Well, if this be true, it is high time America knew it. And double is my conviction tonight of the need of a constitutional amendment that will let the Government in time of war commandeer such business as won't do its part, just as it commandeers the men who must make the fight with blood and life in the front lines. It is high time, in light of Mr. Baruch's statement of today, that the people took their pens in hand and let their representatives know that they really wanted to see profit taken out of war, not just talk about it. Here is a challenge if ever there was one. We see how business is going to attack, try to trim, and make harmless any legislative program that really seeks to take the profit out of war.

Profiteers will make themselves heard by Congress, be sure of that. Will the people try to make Congress hear them as well? If they don't they may expect another war to witness the Du Ponts repeating their demand in the last war for larger profits and refusing for 3 months to respond to the request of their Government to build the additional powder factory the Government wanted built with Government money until larger margins of profit were assured.

We ought to want to learn from history and common sense to protect ourselves against being easily drawn into more war, to protect our society from the terrible maladjustments caused by war, the inflation and then the deflation which follows, the rising prices, the outrageous profits, the crushing burdens of debt to be passed on to our children and theirs. It is these causes which have entered into our Senate committee's consideration which is leading to the legislation we shall at once recommend. And none who know its provisions are going to consider it communism simply because it deals drastically with men and institutions whose patriotism is measured by the profit they can gain from war.

FEDERAL ACTIVITIES IN MARYLAND—ADDRESS BY SENATOR RADCLIFFE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, my colleague the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE] delivered a commencement address at the University of Baltimore June 8, 1935, entitled "Comments on Some Recent Federal Activities in Maryland." I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

No one doubts that the young Maryland lawyer of today is facing problems unprecedented in character and extent. Never before has he had better opportunities for clear-headed thinking and constructive action. Essentially the factors of history will be part and parcel of his work. I don't mean that theory of history which holds that history is merely a record of events. History reflects and illustrates development. History, in telling us what we have been and how changes have come about, tells us in part what we are. And so you lawyers of Maryland who come to the bar today are, of course, affected by the history and traditions of our State. Your views, or at least your mental processes, are influenced very largely by the experiences, beliefs, and activities of Maryland lawyers of bygone years.

I want for a few minutes to touch, in a somewhat rambling way, upon certain economic, financial, and political conditions in America as they were a few years ago and as they are today. These I would refer to, not as the basis of an argument, but merely as illustrative of certain modern-day problems and methods of handling them.

Either as lawyers or as judges, you would say that the evidence before us conclusively demonstrates certain facts regarding these conditions. For instance, you would admit as proved that in the early part of 1933 this country was in a state of economic, financial, and political distress which was unprecedented. A state of virtual collapse existed. You will recall that public confidence generally was shattered and that faith and hope in our country and in our institutions were slowly ebbing away. I do not have to go into details because the memories of those trying days will always be with us.

I am sure you will assume that President Roosevelt and his associates showed alertness, industry, and resourcefulness in attempting to handle these problems. What verdict would you render as to the degree of success which these efforts have met? You would not ask for specific proof that there has been a marked improvement in business conditions since 1933. Our banks were all closed—now they are reopened and doing business. Almost every form of industry shows marked improvement. No matter what yardstick is used to measure present economic and financial conditions as contrasted with those of 2 years ago, of course it is true that there has been material progress toward recovery. The fact that we stopped going deeper into the hole of depression and have made headway in a return to normal conditions is certainly a matter of great significance.

Has that progress been a satisfactory one? Were the methods utilized suitable for the grave emergency situation and should these methods be continued in their present form or be modified? These are practical problems which we must face and for which we must find an answer.

In considering the nature of the remedial measures used, several points must, of course, be borne in mind. One is that the emergency required prompt action. When a ship is storm-wracked or sinking, steps for its safety must be taken quickly. Since in such cases there is not the usual time for deliberation, an extra allowance for mistakes is customary and justifiable. The case was an emergency one, and consequently the measures adopted must be considered, not necessarily as part of a permanent policy, but largely from the standpoint of their temporary efficacy in helping to solve pressing problems.

Stress must also be laid upon a comparison of the mental attitudes of the people. The psychological stimulus of action, as opposed to inaction, in times of distress is well recognized. People harassed by a burden of troubles and devoid of hope and faith are dangerous, as history has shown upon so many distressing occasions. If the new Administration diverted people's minds from their troubles to any marked extent and created hope again through the suggestion and inauguration of new measures and new activities, then the Administration, in accomplishing that much alone, has produced good results. There is no doubt of the fact that our people found again a spirit of hope and confidence and that such a return was a most helpful factor after the gloomy days of the first 2 months of 1933.

I hope in contrasting conditions as they were in 1933 with what they are today, I can avoid the irritation of a convalescent. While an invalid is seriously ill, he often suffers bravely and cheerfully, and is patiently and confidently ready to give a real test to methods of treatment. However, when he is well on the road to recovery, frequently he complains of everything done or suggested for his benefit.

When we attempt to gauge the results obtained in the recovery program, we realize that our task is so involved in conflicting principles and activities that our job is not an easy one. We can, of course, describe conditions as they were, and then again as they now are, with a feeling of considerable assurance. The decision, however, as to how much these changes were the result of cause and effect and how much one condition merely followed another, involves a problem which is an exceedingly difficult one to solve. The program outlined by the new Administration was a creative one. Is it not also true that no alternative plan of a comprehensive and concrete nature was urged?

We have had a measure of experimentation during the last 2 years. Some of the results we accept as satisfactory, some we disapprove of. In determining what we want to do, we have the advantage now of the results of experiments in many matters, when before we had theories only. We have, therefore, better evidence before us than we had previously. Certainly we are not Bourbons in that we hold we can learn nothing new. Surely some lessons must be learned from the depression. It would be a sad commentary upon our people if we had to admit that the depression, with all of its terrors, losses, and catastrophes has taught us nothing, has suggested no possibilities of improvement.

Many of our people have studied thoughtfully the situation and the methods utilized to handle it. I should like to comment for a few minutes upon some of these methods of analysis. Hasn't there been a tendency to study the questions too much from the standpoint of special individuals or classes? Haven't we also been too ready to assume that the problems of the State of Maryland were, for instance, the problems of the State of Nevada, or of Colorado, or of Texas, that a method of handling an industry in Maryland must necessarily be a suitable one for regulating it in some other section of the country? During my work as a regional advisor of public works a year or two ago, I came in close contact with sections in my region where the economic problems were totally different from anything which prevailed in Maryland. Of course different yardsticks were necessary.

However, it is certainly true that the well-being of our country demands that all sections should enjoy a fair degree, at least, of prosperity. For instance, the East cannot be prosperous if the West is financially distressed, or if the South is staggering under excessive burdens.

When you, as lawyers, are preparing your case for trial, you want evidence that is direct, specific, and not general. When you are considering the effect of the depression in Maryland and of the results obtained in attempting to overcome it, your best evidence is to study what has happened in Maryland and not what has been done in some other state.

Frequently we hear the charges of inefficiency and extravagance made against the Federal Government. Isn't it helpful for us when we attempt to pass upon that question to consider first of all what has been the experience in Maryland? Well over $100,000,000 have been spent or loaned in Maryland by the Federal Government during the last 2 years. Has that assistance from Washington been necessary? Has it been wisely directed? Has it been helpful? Our relief situation, while not as serious as in some states, was and still is a distressing problem. Approximately $18,000,000 a year have been spent in Maryland in order to meet that situation.

It has been suggested that there has been extravagance in the handling of that fund in Maryland. If so, the blame must be laid upon our own officials and not upon Washington, because the relief fund is handled by Maryland officials and not by those in Washington. The officials of Maryland not only handle the fund, but estimate how much is necessary for relief purposes.

Has anyone suggested that Maryland could have, without oppressive taxation or dangerous attempts at borrowing money, been able to handle this relief situation? You will remember the difficulties met in getting the Maryland Legislature during the last session to raise even a small percentage of that amount which was necessary. Officials of Maryland implored Washington to come to the assistance of Maryland by contributing the greater part of the money which these Maryland officials insisted was needed, and Washington is giving the money asked for. You can well realize whether any other method of financing the relief situation in Maryland could have been found.

In 1932 and 1933 some of our banks and other kinds of financial institutions were in sore straits. Help was needed by these institutions or they would have failed. Is there evidence available to show that either the State of Maryland or the city of Baltimore or private sources could have furnished the funds necessary for these institutions? Many of our building-and-loan associations were frozen by inactive loans. The Federal Government has furnished the funds to help these associations, and, in doing so, has saved many thousands of people in Maryland from losing their homes. Incidentally, the city of Baltimore has collected much over $1,000,000 in back taxes because these loans were made by the Federal Government. The result has been a helpful boost in handling our Baltimore tax situation.

This is not the time to stop to go further into details. It is a proper question for you gentlemen, trained in the law, to decide whether or not the activities of the Federal Government for the relief of Maryland were necessary and if they have been helpful; also whether substitute methods of handling the situation could have been found if the Federal Government had not shouldered the principal burden.

If you believe that the Federal Government has been helpful in Maryland, that the expenditures here have, in the main, been necessarily made and, on the whole, been conducted fairly reasonably, have you sufficient evidence before you to show that the payments or loans by the Federal Government in Tennessee or North Dakota have been unnecessary and improper? It is difficult enough for you to understand the situation in your own state. An analysis becomes exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, when you attempt to study conditions with which you do not have close contact and where, consequently, the evidence you have is necessarily so remote and incomplete.

As I have said, general and sweeping statements are frequently made as to extravagancies and inefficiency in Washington. But it is admitted by everyone that many of the departments in Washington, handling considerable bulk of the operations of the Federal Government, have been effective and economical. Since this is the case, does not the law of averages preclude such generalizations of inefficiency?

Perhaps you may say that the mistakes which have been made in Washington preclude also any sweeping generalization as to the complete success of the recovery program of the Administration. You have some warrant for that, but in stating your conclusions you should observe a true sense of proportion and of relative values. If you do this, you cannot fail to agree that the marked improvement in business conditions, in addition to other desirable results, justifies a favorable verdict, on the whole, upon the remedial program of Washington, and demonstrates clearly that President Roosevelt has put up a winning fight against the depression.

Some of our problems have been accentuated by recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. How are we going to handle these problems, both from a legal and a business standpoint? Many of us, I fear, are inclined to prejudice our judgments by our approach to the subject. We insist, as advocates of either the new deal, rugged individualism, conservatism, or liberalism, as the case may be, that we must come at the matter from some particular angle. We insist upon wearing a label and try to adhere to what that label stands for. You don't handle your mental processes in business matters handicapped by such absurd shackles. You try to work out a problem in your business or in your profession according to special factors. You don't, as a lawyer or business man, insist that you must handle each business matter from the viewpoint of a "new dealer" or of a conservative. As a matter of fact, if you tried to live up to any such classification, it would possibly have a significance in your mind totally different from what it would have in the opinions of your neighbors.

When some of us suggest that we must return to the old times, what do we mean by that statement? History shows us that at any period in the life of our country, or of any other country, there is a certain amount of change in process,—always there is movement. Nobody can assume that some changes will not come about in the future. Someone in the Bible said: "Ye are the people and wisdom shall die with you." The founders of our Constitution would have combated very strenuously the application of such language to themselves. They did not believe that their judgment was conclusive for all time. They took special pains to provide machinery for amendment of the Constitution. Washington and Madison, for instance, would have been the first to have objected to unqualified praise of their work or to the theory that their judgment in framing the Constitution was final in every respect.

Certainly amendments to the Constitution of the United States should not be made until the most careful deliberation and consideration have been given to them, not only concerning the intrinsic merit of the proposed changes, but also as to their probable effect upon the general basic structure of the Constitution, after due regard is paid to the doctrine of the "wisdom of the ancients." However, many changes have, of course, been made in the Constitution since its adoption. The suggestion, therefore, that other changes should be made does not warrant any loose statements to the effect that someone is trying to make an assault on the Constitution.

We would be equally as foolish if we were given to adopting new panaceas without careful thought and study. No one questions that the fanatic is a menace. There is an equal danger, however, from the man who fails to see the light when it is brought to him. The man who believes that no improvement is possible is as great a menace as the harebrained enthusiast, and doubtless as much so as the unscrupulous demagogue.

You recall that the old-fashioned histories devoted most of their contents to the accounts of battles and wars and very little to the economic and social life of the people. Do you believe that our country ever faced more serious problems or greater dangers of any character than those which existed in March 1933? Certainly you must assume that if emergency measures have ever been essential and justifiable in the past they were needed then.

Emergency measures are not new in our government. The World War illustrated that fact. The people of the country have acquiesced often in emergency legislation which may or may not have been constitutional. That happened, for instance, during the Civil War. Lincoln is justly regarded as a defender of our Constitution, yet it is significant that on one occasion the Chief Justice of the United States, who, by the way, was a Marylander, criticized the President in one of the most severe opinions ever submitted from the bench. You will recall that President Lincoln had, as a war measure, suspended the writ of habeas corpus. Chief Justice Taney, in the case of Ex parte Merryman, declared that this suspension was a violation of the Constitution of the United States and, in doing so, expressed his views in very vigorous language.

Incidentally, I should like to add that in my opinion no other president in our history, not even President Lincoln, has ever met adverse criticism and harassing problems of administration with more poise, cheerfulness, self-control, and equanimity than has President Roosevelt. In the light of that fact, I believe that criticism of his discussion of the recent Supreme Court decision is quite lacking in sense of proportion at least.

Often in our history, as I have said, emergency measures have been adopted and actual extensions by legislative action of our Constitution have been made. In the end, matters have usually righted themselves, either by the elimination of such emergency activities, by subsequent judicial approval, or by constitutional amendment. Certainly no thoughtful person can believe that in this present situation the people of the United States will fail to dispose of such pending questions of constitutionality just as satisfactorily and efficiently as our forefathers have done before us.

It may be that we are too ready to assume that the Administration should have anticipated certain conclusions reached later by the court. Frequently we refer in these days to the Dred Scott decision. In doing so, let us bear in mind that apparently the master minds of that period and of the generation preceding, Webster, Clay, Calhoun, and other great constitutional lawyers, did not foresee the Dred Scott decision.

In the beginning of this talk I commented on the fact that you, as Maryland lawyers, have certain heritages. Let me dwell on one of them for a moment. I have reference to the attitude of the people of Maryland some years prior to the Civil War and during its early stages. At that time Marylanders believed that both the people of the North and the people of the South were too intense and partisan in their feelings, and that prejudice, and not good judgment, prevailed in those sections. They insisted that a method of adjustment of the general problems which for many years had hung over our country was possible through peaceful means. It is to the everlasting credit of Maryland that constantly efforts were thus being made by our people to compose the differences between the North and South and to avoid or to end the war by wise counsel rather than by the sword.

So I believe that, in the study and determination of the problems which now engross the people of our country, much of that same old spirit of tolerance, of fair play, and of mutual regard for the wishes and views of other people, will characterize the citizens of Maryland. If we are consistent with the policy of our fathers, we will avoid sweeping statements either of condemnation or of excessive praise. We will try to keep away from unsound legal processes, but we will not exclude from our thought and considerations any facts or suggested solutions, irrespective of whether they support any particular brand of political philosophy or any specific theory of economic and financial activity.

Some of the discussion recently in regard to the N. R. A., on the other hand, illustrates a spirit of intolerance of judgment and lopsidedness of criticism. Problems growing out of maladjustment between production and distribution, out of increase of monopolistic tendencies and of anti-trust regulations, were acute. The N. R. A., which was unusual and far-reaching in its operations, was designed to play an important role in the handling of such matters. Thoughtful people have been inclined to agree that some of the results of the N. R. A. have been beneficial,—some of them have been probably unsatisfactory. Yet how seldom did we hear a discussion in Maryland which was even-tempered on the subject. We heard glowing statements of unqualified praise, or denunciation of the N. R. A. as being vicious. Our Maryland forefathers of 75 or 100 years ago, in considering the important problems of the day, showed more poise and more orderly processes of reasoning. If they had been summarizing the purposes and results of the N. R. A., they would have formed doubtless a much better judgment in recognizing its strong points and in decrying its weak ones. After analyzing the situation they also would have suggested what should be retained and what should be modified or omitted. In this discussion I am referring to economic aspects of the N. R. A. and not to constitutional questions involved.

If you lawyers from Maryland live up to the heritage of your Maryland forefathers, you will take a leading part in shaping the policies of Maryland in the handling of the vexatious economic and legal problems which now absorb our attention. You have, as I stated before, a glorious opportunity to do helpful and constructive work for your state and for your nation. Let me urge you to stand steadfast, not necessarily for any particular views, because these may properly be subject to change. I would urge you, however, to stand steadfast for sound processes in the collection of evidence, in its analysis, and in the forming of your opinions.

THE TAX PROGRAM

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the New Orleans Item on the subject of the Present Tax Program.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Orleans Item of June 22, 1935]

IF DONE, 'TWERE WELL IF IT WERE DONE QUICKLY

It is possible that among the many memorable messages that President Roosevelt has sent to the Congress historians will record that of Wednesday, calling for increased inheritance and gift taxes on great bequests, higher taxes for vast personal incomes, and a higher tax on net corporate incomes, as being the most important.

If these recommendations are adopted, our country is at the beginning of a new era. For we would no longer go on the theory that national development, progress, and prosperity result from accumulation of huge fortunes and excessive expansion of the greatest corporations.

The multi-multi-millionaire and the billionaire would fade out of our society, not immediately, but at any rate inevitably. The chief heir to every great fortune will not be the children of the accumulator or possessor of it, but the Government, and hence the whole people.

The President proposes to break up the vaster fortunes of the country by taxation, and to apply the proceeds to retiring the national debt, thereby relieving small and large taxpayers of that much of the heavy taxation that this debt imposes.

Generally speaking, our views were expressed by a Congressman who discussed the message on Thursday. He does not believe in soaking either the rich or the poor. Comparatively few have vast fortunes. These are naturally known to the Government through their income returns. So there can be no question of the ability of a Government controlled by popular vote to take part of their gains this way. The same applies to inheritances.

The question is one solely of a national policy and philosophy of government. Whatever is permanently best for the most people should be done in any representative government.

That the Nation and States and cities must come to taxation of future securities of the sort now exempt seems to us beyond question. We cannot continue to issue these public bonds and other securities in enormous quantities and exempt them from taxation. They can be multiplied until a vast part of the real wealth and income of the country would be represented in tax-exempt securities. This would eventually mean a class of privileged persons investing their money in tax-exempt securities and living on their incomes without any due contribution to government for the protection and privileges the taxpayers afford them.

We believe there are no tax-exempt securities in Great Britain. We do not recall what the situation is in other countries.

The reaction on the stock market to the President's proposal was not as serious as might have been anticipated. The real value of securities do not depend very much on their concentration in the hands of the few.

In normal times it might be possible to liquidate over a period of months all the securities held by the Rockefellers, for example, without unduly depressing the market.

If the Federal Government were made the heir to a great part of the Ford fortune, a more difficult problem in liquidation might arise. But the answer on ways and means of collecting Government revenue through superincome taxes, and through what the British call "death taxes", is to be found in a record already established in England.

The British, confronted by the problem of unemployment after the war, put on inheritance, gift, and income taxes to such an extent that the British Government has derived a vast part of its great revenue from these sources. They did not do this in order to break up great fortunes. Their people stood for these taxes out of the necessities of the case.

In theory, the old laws of primogeniture and entail survive in England. In practice a supertax is collected, and heavy "death duties" are dividing and redistributing the great fortunes.

So far as general business and recovery are concerned, we incline to believe, now that President Roosevelt has come forward with these recommendations, that Congress had better stay in session long enough to shape and adopt them. The very rich have been in a sort of apprehension ever since 1929. If the Federal Government is to make itself an heir by great inheritance taxes and the like, it is better to go ahead with it and let everybody know the most that the administration contemplates as early as possible.

There is no need for dragging an issue of this kind into a political campaign, where rival sets of politicians are seeking office on rival promises of confiscation and on futile promises of making every man rich. This just can't be done, though the Federal Government can gradually retire its bonds out of supertaxes on great incomes and on increased inheritance taxes.

Those bonds were issued to carry on a war of arms and a succeeding war on destitution and national decay. By means of that first war, some of the great fortunes of the country were accumulated. This made the war against national dissolution necessary. We trust that coming legislation will prevent this ever happening again.

When our own Government was set up on this side of the Atlantic by revolting English colonists, a policy was adopted against "entailing"—or perpetuating—great fortunes in single families. In Great Britain the oldest son inherited the ancestral estate and the ancestral fortunes, and the younger children of the wealthy families had to scramble for themselves. This country established a policy against the time-honored practice of passing down lands, which represented wealth, to one member only of the holder's family, for many succeeding generations. Wealth is now represented by a great many other things than land. But there is nothing new in the principle of preventing an accumulation of wealth through the generations as snowballs expand into boulders as they roll down hill.

Our civil law was inherited from the French. The code Napoleon provided that every man's accumulation must be divided among his wife and all his children. This disperses large fortunes to a large degree. We cannot see that it has worked to the detriment of society in Louisiana. On the contrary, we think the result of it is good.

For some time we have had a feeling that it does not matter so much in what direction we move as a nation, so long as we get things settled, get the rules of the game understood, and can adjust ourselves to the idea that we are not going to wake up tomorrow to embark on some further course.

It is not going to make a great deal of difference to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Sr., what is done with his great fortune. We are not sure that it is going to make any great difference to Henry Ford. But it is important to the country, if new rules are to be adopted, that these be formulated and put in force as soon as possible, so that the country can begin to build permanently in the direction in which it is to move.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF RAILWAYS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution favoring Government ownership and operation of railways, adopted by the Railway Labor Executives' Association at a meeting held in Washington, D. C., June 19 and 20, together with a letter of transmittal thereof.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES' ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1935.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WHEELER: At the meeting of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, held in the Hamilton Hotel, Washington, D. C., June 19 and 20, the attached resolution favoring Government ownership and operation of the railways of the United States was adopted.

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Switchmen's Union of North America did not join in this action.

I thought you would be interested in the attitude of the organized railway employees, especially so in view of the fact that you now have pending a Government ownership bill.

Respectfully yours,

G. M. HARRISON, Chairman.

Whereas it has become increasingly clear, since the beginning of the depression, that a fundamental revision of the public policy respecting the railways of the United States is necessary. Isolated problems have been given the attention of Congress and of the regulatory bureaus concerned with railway affairs; emergency measures of several kinds have been taken, dealing with different aspects of railway difficulties; new regulatory agencies have been established, old agencies have been revamped, and new duties have been given to existing bodies. But the continuance of the basic abuses of the industry and the reappearance of old problems under new forms as regulation was evaded indicate that none of the proposals adopted have reached to the causes of the general railway distress; and

Whereas study of the many problems of the industry shows conclusively that the responsibility for most of its major difficulties is to be found in the fact that the railways have come under the practically complete domination of the banking and financial interests of the country. Control by these interests, which center in a few powerful Wall Street banking houses, is exerted largely through their representation upon the boards of directors of the railway corporations. In many cases ownership by financial institutions of large amounts of railway bonds has given to them the power to control railway managements. Because of the wide distribution of railway stocks among individual investors, it has also been possible for banking institutions by ownership of a relatively small proportion of the total railway capital to exert an unduly great influence upon railway managements. By these and other means, such as the creation of highly questionable holding companies, the bankers have riveted their control upon this, our most vital industry; and

Whereas railway financiers had, during the decade preceding the depression, pursued in an especially reckless manner their general policy of taking for themselves as large a proportion of railway revenue as possible, while they loaded the industry down with a heavy and unjustified burden of debt. The growth of competing transportation agencies and the need for improved managerial methods to meet that competition were neglected by the railways under the urge of this purely financial control. The demand for increased returns to railway financiers and the efforts to unify specific properties along the lines which haphazard intercorporate relationships dictated resulted in relocations of facilities and various types of unifications and mergers which had no relationship whatever to the transportation needs of the country. Hundreds of thousands of railway workers were thus thrown out of employment and a large number of communities throughout the country were destroyed to increase the returns to the wholly irresponsible groups controlling the railways. These short-sighted policies, planned only to produce immediate gains for railway financiers, inflicted upon the industry very serious injury; and

Whereas the effects of the depression, which would have been serious even had the industry been properly financed, were under the circumstances disastrous. Railway revenues naturally declined, until the net income was in many cases barely sufficient to meet the swollen fixed charges brought about by pre-depression finance. The railway industry, which had been so rich a harvest for these financiers and which merited their forbearance and protection, was now not only to be abandoned, so far as further financing was concerned, but was to feel a demand for a continuance of payments to its security owners, which has brought the industry to the verge of complete collapse. Necessary new financing has been denied. Refinancing of maturing obligations has been denied. Railway managements throughout the country have been forced to reduce expenditures for operating purposes not only to the minimum but far below the lowest level consistent with proper operations. Railway facilities have been allowed to deteriorate to the point where the efficiency of railway service has been seriously impaired and where its safety has been greatly reduced. Railway workers absolutely necessary to a proper maintenance and operation of the railways have been thrown out of employment in order that the money which should have been paid in wages might be diverted to satisfy the demands of the railway financiers. The conditions thus brought about, already grave enough, will become even more dangerous unless they are immediately corrected. Railway roadbeds and equipment, already badly undermaintained, must show in future months in still greater degree the results of these years of neglect; and

Whereas it has become clear that neither railway revenues nor new private financing within any reasonable time in the future will permit the restoring of proper conditions upon the railroads. Any future increase in revenues will certainly be diverted as past revenues have been, to the satisfaction of the demands of railway financiers. The United States Government has, during the depression, taken over the duties and the responsibilities of these financial groups to the railway industry. Refinancing of maturing obligations and the financing of necessary maintenance and improvement of equipment has had to be undertaken by the Federal Government. Whatever advantages may come to the industry as a result of such public financing will certainly be taken by private financial groups if they are permitted to do so. It is evident that the industry will be dependent upon public financing for a long time to come; as a result of that financing, the holdings of private financial groups will increase in value; and

Whereas a multiplicity of abuses which developed in the industry as a result of private ownership and operation had brought about in the half century preceding the depression a complex and chaotic body of regulatory laws, both State and National. These laws were in large part designed to check the abuses of private financing and operation of the roads. Of necessity, they were almost entirely negative in character. The railway corporations, by the diversion of railway revenues for the employment of an army of attorneys, persistently sought methods by which governmental regulation could be evaded or could be turned to the advantage of railway corporations. The real purposes of regulation were thus defeated; and

Whereas the railway industry faces the necessity not alone of restoring its equipment and service to normal, but also of adapting itself to the new conditions brought about by the development of other transportation facilities. The chaotic operating and management conditions caused by the peculiarities of financial relationships must be corrected. All of these conditions will require constructive and positive measures in the public interest; and

Whereas governmental regulation by its very character is unfitted for such positive and constructive measures and there is every reason to believe that the financial interests controlling the railways will endeavor to thwart rather than to foster the public interest in the era of reorganization which confronts the industry; and

Whereas public ownership and operation of the railways under the Federal Government will permit the integration of the railways in the manner most conducive to safe, efficient, and economical operation. Federal financing under Federal ownership will cost much less and can be much more wisely directed than either private or public financing under private ownership and operation. The necessary coordination of railways with other types of transportation can be done in a manner to safeguard public interests only if there is complete governmental control of the railways. The immediate rehabilitation of railway facilities, which is absolutely essential to the safe and efficient operation of the railways, is not possible excepting through Federal financing, and will be very difficult unless with Federal financing there is also Federal ownership and operation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Railway Labor Executives' Association hereby declare themselves as favoring the immediate taking over of the railways of the United States by the Federal Government and the creation of agencies within the Federal Government to manage and operate the railways.

FARMERS' HOME CORPORATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2367) to create the Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy, to engage in rural rehabilitation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. Two amendments, that of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and that of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], went over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, first, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma was the one pending at the conclusion of the session on Saturday last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Both amendments to which the Chair has referred went over. The Senator from Oklahoma offered his amendment prior to the Senator from Minnesota offering his amendment. That is the reason the Chair said the question was on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 16, line 25, beginning with the words "or otherwise", it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "forestation", in line 2 on page 17, as follows:

or otherwise made available for rural rehabilitation, and prevention of soil erosion, reforestation, and forestation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am sorry that I do not discern at this time the presence in the Chamber of the Senator from Oklahoma. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Alabama. As I recall, the appropriation for the governmental activities referred to in the clause proposed to be stricken out is carried in the $4,800,000,000 appropriation passed here a few months ago. That work now has been placed in charge of Dr. Tugwell, as I recall. Is this an effort to take the work and the appropriation away from Dr. Tugwell and cast them into the lap of the board to be created by this bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I could not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. McNARY. Will this take the supervision and control of the work away from Dr. Tugwell and repose it in the board to be created under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to eliminating the words "prevention of soil erosion", but the words were included in the bill at the suggestion of Dr. Tugwell. The insertion of the words is agreeable to Dr. Tugwell, but I have no objection to striking out the words "prevention of soil erosion."

Mr. McNARY. I am not speaking of soil erosion. I am not particular whether the language referred to is in the bill or not. My inquiry was developed by a suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma. I am merely wondering if the Forest Service is to be deprived of reforestation work, and if this is an effort to take away from their jurisdiction the work of reforestation and place it under the jurisdiction of the board to be created by this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is not. It is simply a question of the source from which the funds may come. It does not interfere in any way with the administration of the work of the prevention of soil erosion, forestation, or reforestation.

Mr. McNARY. Is some of this work, particularly that relating to soil erosion and reforestation, left with Dr. Tugwell? If the money is taken away as proposed, would not the work then be placed within the jurisdiction of the board to be created by the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The provision does not give the board any power whatever over soil erosion, forestation, or reforestation. It is simply a permissive plan for the allocation of money under the Work Relief Act which might be devoted to this purpose.

I do not know why soil erosion was suggested to be included, but I can well understand why reforestation ought to be left in the bill, because under the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] the bill authorizes the creation and development of farms in the forests, subject to approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McNARY. In view of the great work which has been done and which is now being done by the Forest Service, I am anxious to know are we to duplicate that work now by transferring to this proposed corporation funds which have heretofore been appropriated by the Congress? In other words, is the corporation to do the same work in the matter of reforestation that the Forest Service is now doing and has been doing so very well?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. The corporation is to deal solely with the acquisition of farms for tenants and others who are specified in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that, as I interpret the language of the bill, the proposal is to deduct from the funds which in the $5,000,000,000 bill were allocated for reforestation and the prevention of soil erosion, $300,000,000. This sum, under the bill, is to be transferred to the corporation which is to be organized under the measure before us and to be employed by it to carry out in part the project—I was about to say, the fantastic project—which it is organized to develop. If this amendment prevails, then $300,000,000 which were to have been employed for reforestation and other purposes will be deducted from the amount allotted for such purposes.

Mr. McNARY. I think that is true, and that would bring about a duplication of the work by two separate governmental agencies.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that is not the way I understand the provision. My impression, from a casual reading, is that this provision merely has relation to the transfer of funds which have been allocated under the Work Relief Act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. There was a certain fund allocated to rural rehabilitation, prevention of soil erosion, forestation, and reforestation, and out of that fund so allocated the President may transfer a sufficient amount to pay this subscription. That is all I understand to be involved in the provision.

Mr. McNARY. If that be true, it is a depletion of the amount of money allotted for this purpose, to be transferred to the proposed corporation for expenditure in connection with its activities.

Mr. ROBINSON. In one sense that is true, but the Senator will also recall there is a provision in the Work Relief Act giving the President power to transfer from one allocation to another a percentage of the whole fund; so it perhaps would not be of controlling importance.

Mr. McNARY. I have an interest merely to prevent duplication of governmental activities, and further, I do not think there should be a depletion of this work by the transfer of these funds to the corporation to be set up under the bill. Inasmuch as the question has been raised by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I think it would be well to let it go over until he is present. As a matter of courtesy I make that request of the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the amendment go over until such time as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] may be present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should not wish to see entered, as I do not think the Senator from Oregon would, an agreement which would make it impossible to dispose of the bill. I do not know where the Senator from Oklahoma is detained. I suggest that the amendment be passed over for the present. To such an arrangement I would have no objection.

Mr. McNARY. That is what I am asking.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma be passed over temporarily. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, before we leave the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Oregon to one phase of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado reserve the right to object to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ADAMS. Only for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senator from Oregon to a particular clause in the Work Relief Act which is broader than the language contained in the bill now before us. There was an allocation under the Work Relief Act of $350,000,000 not merely for soil erosion and reforestation but for other purposes. I read the clause:

> Sanitation, prevention of soil erosion, prevention of stream pollution, seacoast erosion, reforestation, forestation, flood control, rivers and harbors, and miscellaneous projects.

We heard much said during the debate to the effect that the phrase "miscellaneous projects" covered many things. If we take away from this allocation of $350,000,000 money to be used in the farm-tenant program, we are going to take funds away from flood control and the other projects. While the matter is under consideration, I merely wished to bring that clause to the attention of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the supplemental remarks of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. GORE entered the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma is now present. Does the Senator from Oregon desire to continue consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the point raised, that the amendment should go over because the Senator from Oklahoma was not present, is not now well taken, because the Senator is present.

I simply desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, I do not want to see the Forest Service work taken out of the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. I do not want to see that work interfered with, and if this provision of the bill does interfere with it, I should feel inclined to oppose it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand that this provision transfers the Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to any other department, nor do I understand that it makes any transfer of any service as now assigned. Its only effect, as I attempted to say a few minutes ago, is to empower the President to authorize payment of the subscription to the capital stock of the corporation proposed to be created from the fund provided in the Work Relief Act which was allocated to these various purposes. It would tend to deplete that fund.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas has stated generally the effect of this amendment. I agree with him that it does not contemplate, as I read it, the transfer of any part of the work of the Forest Service to the organization which under the terms of the bill is to be created. But, as was stated a moment ago by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] the measure which was passed, known as the "$5,000,000,000 work-relief joint resolution", carries several hundred million dollars for soil erosion, flood control, sanitation, removal of pollution from interstate streams, and so forth. This bill authorizes the President to divert a part of that fund to carrying out the purposes of this measure. The sole discretion in the matter, as I read the bill, rests with the President, and if this bill were passed tomorrow the President could immediately subtract from the $5,000,000,000 fund $300,000,000, and allocate it to the corporation which is being created by the bill under consideration.

I may be in error, but I cannot help but believe that the thought was entertained by some of the proponents of this measure that there would be opposition to a direct appropriation of $300,000,000 to be added to the $50,000,000 provided as the initial capital of the corporation, and that to soften or remove this opposition resort would be had to the $5,000,000,000 fund, and $300,000,000 subtracted from it to be made available for use by the corporation which this bill creates.

Undoubtedly this bill would have met increased opposition if there had been a direct appropriation of the amount indicated. It is about enough to appropriate $50,000,000 as the first subscription to the capital stock of the corporation, but it would have been much more objectionable to have added $300,000,000 more as a direct appropriation from the Treasury to be met, of course, by increased taxes and increased borrowings. I have no doubt that it was believed that we were reconciled to the enormous appropriation of nearly $5,000,000,000 for relief and for divers and sundry purposes indicated in the bill, and that to utilize $300,000,000 of that stupendous sum to aid in carrying out the purposes of the measure under consideration would not be regarded as of any great importance. In other words, having committed to the Government the expenditure of this enormous sum of nearly $5,000,000,000, it would not meet with any particular opposition to divert $300,000,000 to be used to carry out this unsound adventure, provision for which is found in the bill under consideration.

I confess that I have been somewhat surprised at the lack of interest evinced by Senators in the bill before us, and I have marveled at the lack of opposition to a measure which confessedly so inadequately deals with the broad question of providing farms for the millions of tenant farmers of the United States if it is regarded as a proper function of the Government to undertake this stupendous task. I think it is conceded by some Senators that the measure is doomed to failure; that similar schemes in this and other countries have proved futile; but the habit is being developed of accepting with but little opposition almost any measure that is presented for consideration. Executive departments and agencies and "brain trusters" prepare bills and bring them to Congress where they are offered, and where it is expected they will meet with immediate favor and be passed without amendment or opposition. Not infrequently the statement is made that opposition will be unavailing and, therefore, it is better to expeditiously dispose of bills that are drafted by various persons in executive branches of the Government.

Formerly proposed legislation was prepared by Members of Congress after investigation and consideration. That procedure has been departed from very largely, and now-a-days we accept, usually without much question, the bills that are handed to us by executive agencies and by representatives of various organizations and groups.

Mr. President, in my opinion it would be for the best interest of the country to adopt a different policy in connection with the preparation and consideration of proposed legislative measures. Certainly it would be in keeping with the duties and responsibilities of Congress if the stupendous sum of $4,880,000,000 carried in the so-called "relief measure" was required for the purposes therein indicated, then it is unfair to deduct from it the $350,000,000 which I assume will constitute a part of the amount that may be expended under the terms of the pending measure. If $350,000,000 and additional sums are to be used in this adventure, it seems to me that we should frankly confess that fact and make direct appropriations or authorizations, and take the necessary steps to levy taxes in order to meet the expenditures.

An examination of the bill shows the latitude which is permitted to the corporation. Not only is it to have $350,000,000 but it is authorized to issue an unlimited amount of capital stock and to issue bonds to the extent of $1,000,000,000. There are no adequate checks or restrictions such as it would seem should be made where such enormous sums are to be expended by a corporation which is to be organized under the pending bill. As I read the bill there is no limit as to the capital stock which may be issued and there are no proper restrictions in connection with the issue of bonds amounting to $1,000,000,000 and in the expenditure of funds derived therefrom.

Mr. President, I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I am opposed to deducting from the funds provided for sanitation, flood control, and other important purposes, either the $50,000,000 provided in this bill for the initial capital or $300,000,000 to aid in executing the purposes of this proposed legislation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am glad to be assured of the support of the Senator from Utah; and I wish to add that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is entirely correct when he says that the pending bill does not provide that the Reforestation Service or Soil Conservation Service shall be transferred from the Department of Agriculture to this new tenant corporation. He is entirely correct about that. It does not direct such transfer. It does not even authorize the transfer of the Reforestation or Soil Conservation Service from the Department of Agriculture to this corporation. That is not the point. It does, however, authorize the President to transfer the money which has heretofore been set aside for the Reforestation and Soil Conservation Service from that Service to the corporation being created by this bill. The Service remains where it was. The Reforestation and Conservation Service remains with the Department of Agriculture. It is the money only that is being taken away from the Service. I must confess that we feel some little solicitude about the money as well as the Service.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the use of continuing the Service where it is if there is not to be any money to operate it? That is the thing to which I object.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that is just the point. As Senators know, the $4,800,000,000 act was broken down into eight general categories, designating eight general schemes or projects to which the money could be devoted. The eighth and last carried some $350,000,000, but in that general classification or category were some five or six different kinds of services or projects to which that particular appropriation could be applied. Five or six general objects were to be covered by the $350,000,000 carried in that category. Among them were, I believe, sanitation, rehabilitation, reforestation, and soil conservation.

Up to date only $25,000,000 have been set aside for the Soil Conservation Service. As I stated on Saturday, delegations of Senators and Representatives waited both on the Secretary of Agriculture and on the President, requesting that $150,000,000 be allotted to the Soil Conservation Service for 2 years. So far only $25,000,000 has been set aside for that purpose. I understand that a requisition has been presented to the proper authorities requesting a much larger allotment. The exact amount I do not know. So far it is confidential. I have been unable to ascertain it. What action will be taken it is also impossible to ascertain, but Senators all appreciate the importance of the Soil Conservation Service, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] no less than the rest of us, and no less than the most ardent of us; and I hope the Senator will accept the pending amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in view of the evident misunderstanding of the purpose of this part of the committee amendment, and as I regard it as of no particular value to the bill—it was put in at the suggestion of the very people who are going to administer the soil-erosion program—in view of the discussion and misunderstanding and misapprehension about it, I am perfectly willing to have the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I have on the desk be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 20, beginning at line 3, it is proposed to strike out all of the first sentence of subsection (e), and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

> The Corporation is authorized to appoint attorneys and shall, subject to the civil-service laws, employ such officers, examiners, and other experts and employees as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act and to fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is there any provision that any of these officials must be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; there is no provision to that effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Louisiana that there is a provision in the bill, as I understand, that those receiving salaries in excess of $4,000 shall be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Not in this amendment.

Mr. KING. No; not in this amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But in the bill itself.

Mr. KING. That may be.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, whose amendment is this? Is it the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. My amendment is now pending.

Mr. LONG. Whose amendment is it which was just read?

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate to discuss this amendment, because I think it is unnecessary to do so. I have modified the amendment to comply with the objection of the two Senators from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the committee amendment, and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 22, line 18, after the word "thereof" and the period, it is proposed to insert a new sentence as follows:

> No separate tract of property shall be bought at a price in excess of the value shown by the appraisal as herein provided for.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Alabama has no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 20 of the committee amendment, lines 22 and 23, I move to strike out the words "without regard to the provisions of any other law governing the expenditure of public funds." Let me read a portion of the preceding sentence. Before doing so let me suggest that it must not be forgotten that this bill provides for a corporation, upon which is conferred enormous power with almost unlimited authority. There are no provisions ample and satisfactory to guide it or to restrain it in its activities. It may spend the $50,000,000 of capital stock authorized and also $300,000,000 provided in the bill. It may also issue unlimited capital stock following the $50,000,000 issue, and then issue bonds to the extent of $1,000,000,000.

It seems inconceivable that Congress would pass a measure of this character and confer such unrestrained power upon a corporation controlled by three directors. No one can determine the amount which will be expended, nor where and when expended. I repeat, because that fact should be emphasized, that Congress, in my opinion, is failing in its duty when it gives a charter to a corporation authorizing it to perform public functions and private activities and to expend enormous sums, the aggregate of which may not be determined.

A few years ago Congress was cautious in making appropriations. It was meticulous in its demands to know how public funds were to be expended, but it seems that the habit has grown so upon us of making enormous appropriations, too often without adequate restrictions and reservations, that even the suggestion that we halt for the purpose of providing proper limitations meets with no support, but, upon the contrary, with opposition.

I now read a portion of the preceding sentence:

> The Corporation shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails for its official business in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government, and shall determine the necessary administrative and other expenditures under this act and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid.

Following this language of the bill are the words which I have moved to strike out, namely:

> Without regard to the provisions of any other law governing the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. President, I am amazed that a measure should have been submitted for our consideration which contains the words which I have moved to eliminate. Why should this corporation proceed without regard to the provisions of laws governing the expenditure of public funds? It would seem from the language of the bill that this corporation, which is to be created and which will expend hundreds of millions of public funds, will not be subjected to whatever laws are found upon the statute books governing public expenditures. The funds to be expended by this corporation come out of the Treasury of the United States; they are wrung from the taxpayers of the United States; and yet it is proposed that the three directors who are to control this proposed corporation may expend hundreds of millions of dollars without supervision or restraint or without being subject to the provisions of laws dealing with public expenditures.

Recently an act was passed by Congress creating a corporation to handle and deal with funds and expenditures in connection with Federal prisons. It was provided in that law, as I recall, that the corporation should be subject to examination provided for under the act of Congress providing a national Budget system and in an independent audit of Government accounts. Senators will recall that under that act there was created an establishment of the Government to be known as the General Accounting Office. It was to be independent of the executive departments and under the control and direction of the Comptroller General of the United States. Senators know that this important provision found in the Budget Act has saved the Government many millions of dollars. It has had a most salutary effect upon executive organizations and upon spending branches and agencies of the Federal Government. I am unwilling that this corporation which it is proposed we shall create shall not be brought under the scrutiny and supervision of the General Accounting Office and the Comptroller General of the United States.

As stated, I have offered an amendment to strike out the words:

> Without regard to the provisions of any other law governing the expenditures of public funds—

And the amendment which I offer will contain the following provision:

> That all expenditures of said Corporation shall be in accordance with the laws generally applicable to the expenditures of the several departments and establishments of the Government. All claims and accounts of said Corporation shall be submitted to the General Accounting Office as provided in the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921.

I think it would be most unfortunate to relieve this proposed corporation of the obligation to have its proceedings and expenditures examined by the General Accounting Office and the Comptroller General of the United States. Certainly it would be reassuring to the taxpayers to know that a corporation which has such unlimited authority to expend hundreds of millions of dollars was subject to examination as to its accounts and expenditures by an independent agency provided by the Federal Government. I cannot believe that there will be opposition to the amendment which I have submitted; and I take the liberty of inquiring of the Senator from Alabama whether he will not accept the amendment. If so, I shall not further discuss it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LONG. This amendment merely provides that the corporation shall be subject to accounting?

Mr. KING. Subject to the same scrutiny and examination as other agencies of the Government and corporations which it has created for various purposes. In other words, this amendment brings this proposed corporation under the terms of title 3 of the National Budget System Act. Title 3, among other things, requires that the General Accounting Office and the Comptroller General of the United States shall examine all claims and demands and accounts whatever in which the Government of the United States is concerned, either as debtor or creditor, and shall settle and adjust the same in the General Accounting Office.

Mr. LONG. Who is objecting to that?

Mr. KING. I am trying to find out.

Mr. LONG. I myself should like to find out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, the Senator from Utah is opposed to the whole program——

Mr. KING. If the Senator puts his consent to the amendment on that ground, I do not know that I am concerned about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not said anything about consent. I desired to state why the provision referred to was put in the bill. It is immaterial to me whether it remains in it or not.

The corporate organization proposed to be set up was fashioned after the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and a provision similar to that under discussion is in the act setting up that Corporation. Where a corporation such as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, or such as the corporation proposed here, is engaged in a program in the field, I assume the theory is that there are many items and transactions which cannot well be handled if they are required to go through the General Accounting Office.

I followed this program really because, as I have stated, it is the same as the structure of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the Federal land bank is operating under the same program, as is the Federal farm agency. But if the Senate thinks that everything ought to go through the General Accounting Office, I have no objection to it.

I am simply following the precedents set by the Congress in establishing other organizations and corporations. That is the only reason why this provision is here; it was believed to be in line with what the Senate has decided as to corporations of a similar nature, and that it was advisable to have this provision in the law.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Since the Senator from Utah is offering this amendment, may I ask him whether or not in his judgment, if the law should apply as he suggests, it will result in any way in handicapping the activities or retarding the necessary expedition with which matters frequently have to be decided?

Mr. KING. I have no hesitancy whatever in saying, "No; it would not affect it at all." It calls for scrutiny, examination of claims and accounts, and only such examination as is provided by the General Accounting Office, found in the Budget law. I have before me the Budget law, and it provides for the General Accounting Office, and for the examination of certain accounts.

Mr. BLACK. I can state to the Senator, so far as my own attitude is concerned, that there are some agencies which do not come under the General Accounting Office, a large part of whose activities should be subject to examination by that office. Simply for the purpose of offering a cooperative suggestion, I am wondering whether there should be any limitation as to the type of examination or the amount involved in the particular transaction which should be scrutinized by the Accounting Office, with a view to preventing any unnecessary delay, and unnecessary burden upon the Accounting Office.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am merely accepting the spirit and theory of the general accounting law, which applies to all the departments and most of the independent establishments of the Government. I may say to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], in answer to the statement made by him respecting the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, that I am certain that its accounts and expenditures, sooner or later, must come under the provisions of the General Accounting Office.

Mr. LONG. It already has been, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. That is my understanding.

Mr. LONG. The Chairman of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation himself appeared before a committee here and made the most vigorous kind of comment on what had occurred in connection with the home loan business.

Mr. KING. I do not desire to take up time if the Senate is willing to accept my amendment. I call for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the committee amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 23, line 13, after the word "sell", I propose to insert the words "or lease", and on line 14, after the word "contracts", to strike out the period and to insert the words "Provided, however, That no such lease shall be for a period of more than 5 years."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 23, line 13, of the committee amendment, after the word "sell", it is proposed to insert the words "or lease", and on line 14, before the period, to insert the words "Provided, however, That no such lease shall be for a period of more than 5 years", so as to read:

(6) To enter into contracts to sell or lease its properties, and to make conveyances under the terms of such contracts, Provided, however, That no such lease shall be for a period of more than 5 years. The Corporation may lease any farm which has been repossessed by it, pending a resale of said farm.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, when the bill was under consideration some weeks ago it provided an unlimited grant of authority to make leases, and upon the suggestion of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that permissive authority was stricken from the bill.

The situation which this amendment is designed to cover is that of individuals who may not have had successful agricultural experience but who have other qualifications which would indicate that they are capable of making a success of the operation if they are given sufficient assistance in the technical problems of farming.

In order to meet the objection, which I think is well founded, to the Authority to make indeterminate leases granted by the original bill, I have endeavored, by the inclusion of the proviso that no lease shall be for more than a period of 5 years. That, I think, will meet the objections of those who did not wish to see the Authority unlimited.

I sincerely hope the amendment will be agreed to. I have conferred with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] in charge of the bill, and with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who were primarily concerned with the previous amendment, and I find that they have no objection to the amendment I have now offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Alabama, in charge of the bill, to page 22, the matter which we discussed briefly on Friday. I refer to the provision beginning on line 9, as follows:

(4) The Corporation shall limit the loan made to any purchaser to the amount that will provide a farm to be limited in area to the size of an average farm in the State where the land is located as determined by the preceding Federal census, and not to exceed in cost the price of property of similar size and value in the same section or area.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is my understanding that an amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] was agreed to, limiting the price which may be paid to the appraised value.

Mr. BORAH. I did not know that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the Chair is not putting the question on the entire committee amendment as a single amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator in charge of the bill in reference to what seems to me would be a most unfortunate provision. I refer to the provision regarding interest. The provision of subsection (d) on page 25 provides that—

The rate of interest to be charged by the Corporation upon indebtedness owed to it shall be at as low a rate of interest as the Government shall secure the money.

It does not limit it to the rate of interest which the Corporation pays for its money but to as low a rate of interest as that for which the Government shall secure the money.

The money which will be used during the first year will come from the money provided by the Work Relief Act. The relief money may come from taxes and not from bonds. If it comes from taxes, the Government will pay no interest on it. In other words, then the Corporation will be required to lend the money without any interest.

If the money which the Government obtains and turns over to the Corporation comes from its borrowing, there are at least 20 rates of interest at which the Government gets its money. Some of its short-time borrowings have been at a rate as low as one-fourth of 1 percent. Other borrowings of Government money have been at 3½, 4, and 4¼ percent. The rate of interest varies in accordance with the money market and in accordance with the maturity date of the security issue and in accordance with its character. So this provision is utterly unworkable.

It seems to me the sane thing to do is to frame the provision in such a way that the practice may be followed which is pursued in the case of the Home Loan organization and in the Federal land-bank organization, where the rate of interest is fair and just, and is not left in the situation which will exist under the provisions of this bill, which is an impossible situation.

We are loaning, in the case of some of these agencies, at the rate of 3½ percent. There was a controversy on the floor over that. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation is making loans at very reasonable rates. In this bill we are proposing to lend money to the tenant to buy property at as low a rate as that for which the Government can get the money.

The most we can expect the Corporation to get out of its loans will be a fraction of 1 percent. We are putting the tenant in competition with the farmer who owns his property. We are permitting the tenant to buy property without submitting any margin of security, and then his interest rate is practically nothing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think there is a further vice in this particular language, which we encountered particularly in connection with merchant-marine loans. This is the vice: In the first instance, the Government will borrow its money on, let us say, 90-day commitments, and will get the benefit of a rate as low as one-half of 1 percent. Finally, however, the loan will be refinanced on a bonding basis, and the Government will pay 3 percent or 3½ percent for its money. I am speaking now in terms of experience we have had under the merchant marine laws. The bonds will be issued on at least a 2½-percent or 3-percent basis under the existing circumstances. However, under the language in this bill I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] that we would have precisely the situation we had under our merchant marine laws. The borrower would have the benefit of the Government's short-time rate all through the period of his loan, when subsequently the Government itself must pay the long-time rate. Therefore the Government definitely and specifically is losing money on the loan.

Mr. ADAMS. Ultimately the Government has to pay a long-time rate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. The short-time rate, as the term indicates, is a short-time obligation. Sooner or later it has to be converted into a long-time obligation, and a higher rate has to be paid by the Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. We corrected a similar situation in respect to merchant-marine construction loans by adding some such language as this:

> But at not less than 3½ percent in the case of the merchant-marine loans.

Perhaps that rate is too high under present circumstances, but I agree with the Senator from Colorado that there ought to be a floor put under this rate of interest.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me suggest to the Senators who are discussing this subject that we previously had this question before us, and the suggestion made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] was really adopted as to one phase of the matter. Of course, practically all this money is intended to come from bond issues, and I assume that the rate of interest contemplated by this section will be the rate which will have to be paid on the bond issue; that is, the rate at which the money will be loaned will be the same as the rate for which the money is obtained under the bond issue.

Mr. ADAMS. It will be a Government issue, not the Corporation's.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It can be changed from "Government" to "Corporation."

Mr. ADAMS. The difficulty then is that the Corporation does not pay anything for the money it gets from the Government. On the first $100,000,000 it does not pay anything.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand there is an amount which would not be covered by a bond issue. I do not know what the Government will pay for that. It is a comparatively small item, and that money is already appropriated.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to suggest an amendment so that the discussion may be concentrated. I move, on page 25, line 5, following the word "shall", to strike out "be at as low a rate of interest as the Government shall secure the money", and that there be inserted in lieu thereof "not to exceed 3½ percent."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it seems to me that under present circumstances that is a high rate.

Mr. ADAMS. That is to be the maximum. The provision is that it shall not exceed 3½ percent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I misunderstood the Senator. I understood him to suggest that the rate should be 3½ percent.

Mr. ADAMS. No.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may the amendment be again stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 25, line 5, after the word "shall", it is proposed to strike out the words "be at as low a rate of interest as the Government shall secure the money" and to insert in lieu thereof "not to exceed 3½ percent."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few observations on the committee amendment as a whole, which seem to me rather essential. That it is desirable from the national standpoint to substitute ownership for tenancy is obvious. It needs no discussion. There is no question that revolutions and rebellions do not arise from the owners of land, and that wherever ownership can be established we ought to establish it. But from that premise it does not follow that the Government of the United States should provide the funds to make the change from tenancy to ownership.

In the pending bill it is to be noted that the money which is to be used to convert tenancy into ownership comes, in the first year at least, from moneys appropriated for relief purposes. Some of us felt that the $5,000,000,000 appropriation was a little large, but those who insisted upon the $5,000,000,000 appropriation are most urgent that we take part of that money and divert it from the relief purposes over to the purchase of farms.

I know from recent experience that in the western section of the country, where applications have been made for projects, the kind of projects in which the West is interested, permanent projects, increasing the wealth of the country, we have been met with the statement that the permanent projects of that kind do not meet with the standard and the rule laid down under the Work Relief Act; that we did not appropriate enough money; that the money must be expended on a basis of not to exceed $1,150 per man where wages and material must be provided for in connection with a project. So those things which my section of the country has dreamed would come to it under the Work Relief Act cannot come to it. If we adopt the pending measure, it will result in reducing the amount available for work relief, and it will lower the standard by whatever amount is diverted.

This bill, if I read it correctly, proposes to loan the full value of the farm which is to be purchased. That is the intention. It is proposed to take care of the man who is a tenant, and to provide him a farm at Government cost, he to owe the full amount of the purchase price, but to contribute no down payment, no equity. In that respect it is different entirely from the Home Owners' Loan and the Farm Loan Acts. We have loaned our credit to help men save property in which they had an equity. So far we have pursued the policy that where a man had an equity in his home, representing down payments, representing work, representing labor, the Government would save his home and save his farm from foreclosure. We are now taking the other step, and are going to say that every tenant shall have a farm. That, however, is not all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. KING. In addition to the amount loaned on the farm, the full appraised value, as I read the bill, credit is to be extended for the purchase of machinery and other personal property.

Mr. ADAMS. I was about to reach that point. The bill provides that in addition to the farm the tenant will get livestock, equipment, implements, machinery, furnishings, and then there follow these very broad words: "Supplies and facilities." What "supplies and facilities" may mean after he has been supplied with livestock, equipment, implements, machinery, and furnishings I do not know, but that is what he is to be given, and the full purchase price is to be furnished by the Government.

The purpose of the bill is commendable. The farm provided under the bill is to be of the size and fertility, and so stocked and equipped, as reasonably to indicate returns which will permit the repayment of the purchase price.

Mr. President, there is a little mathematics connected with this subject to which I should like to invite attention.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator has been discussing the question of loans. I have not been present during the entire debate on this bill, and I have just noticed some language on page 23 to which I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from Colorado and obtain his viewpoint thereon. In line 2, on page 23, the words "make loans or grants or both" appear. Is it proposed under the bill to make grants?

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator is asking a question which I cannot answer; and it is not the only question about this bill I cannot answer. I cannot understand why the Corporation to be created should make grants.

Mr. HATCH. May I intrude on the time of the Senator from Colorado to ask the Senator from Alabama if that is proposed under the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There may be growing out of the work-relief program some phases, such as rural rehabilitation, in which grants are involved. Of course, in the long run, no grants are intended, and they are not to be made unless there is something along that line under the present emergency.

Mr. HATCH. As I have said, I was unavoidably detained during the explanation given by the Senator from Alabama. I do not want to take up the time of the Senator from Colorado, but those words indicate to me that the policy will be inaugurated by the Corporation of purchasing land and then making gifts of such land.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is not intended.

Mr. HATCH. It is not intended?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am speaking under a time limit.

Mr. HATCH. Very well; I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. ADAMS. It is provided in the bill, roughly, that the tenant shall be provided with what is an average farm at not to exceed the average cost of such a farm in his neighborhood, adequately equipped.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] put into the RECORD day before yesterday a most interesting tabulation which shows that the average value of the average farm in the United States is $7,614. It also shows that the average acreage of farms in the United States is 156 acres. I think those who are supporting this bill have failed to recognize that there is a difference as between agricultural conditions in the various sections of our country. This tabulation, which appears at page 9919 of the RECORD, shows these facts: That the average farm in Colorado has 481 acres and that its average value is $10,497; that the average farm in California has a value of $25,000; that the average farm in Wyoming has 1,469 acres and a value of $12,919; in Nebraska 345 is the average acreage, and the average value is $19,274.

It is proposed to provide for some tenants average farms——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Farms which will not exceed the average.

Mr. ADAMS. Very well. The average value is in excess of $7,000. Suppose we cut that value down to $5,000, and are only going to expend the first year, according to the statement made on the floor the other day, $50,000,000, that money to be allocated by the President. If we spend $50,000,000 in the first year, we will take care of 10,000 out of 2,266,000 tenants. In other words, we take care of less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the tenants of the United States. Yet this bill is being advanced as a great measure designed to solve the deplorable tenancy situation in the United States.

Within 3 years the bill contemplates that there may be spent an additional $300,000,000, seven times as much as during the first year. With such an expenditure we would be able to take care of 2.6 percent of the tenants. What are those who expect to go home and say to the tenants, "We passed a great bill to relieve your deplorable situation", going to reply to the 99 percent who are not taken care of in the first year? Mind you, 99¾ percent of the tenants will not be taken care of the first year. In other words, this bill is a gesture. If we believe sincerely in taking care of the tenancy evil in this country—and it is an evil—let us meet the problem squarely; let us put up the money; let us take care of them and not merely appropriate sufficient to take care of one-fourth of 1 percent the first year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. KING. An appropriation adequate, however, to meet the entire situation would run into the billions.

Mr. ADAMS. If we bought farms for all tenants at the average price, the amount would be $20,000,000,000. If we bought them $5,000 farms, it would be $13,322,000,000. However, I say to the Senator from Utah that if we are going to enter upon such a program, let us not do so on that kind of a basis, saying as we do in the opening of this bill that we are going "to create a Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy", when we are going to correct such economic instability for one-fourth of 1 percent in the first year and for 2½ percent within the limit of the subsequent appropriations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator believe that this is largely intended to meet a situation in 2, 3, or 4 of the Southern States where, by reason of the cotton policy which we inaugurated at the last session under the Bankhead cotton bill, as a result of which many of the tenants were driven from the farm, we are now to take care of those tenants who were thus driven from the farm?

Mr. ADAMS. I cannot attempt to answer that question, but I will say that statistics show that in the State of the Senator in charge of the bill the average farm has 68 acres and its average value is only $1,952, while in the adjoining State of Mississippi the average acreage is 55 and the average value is $1,818. In other words, an entirely different economic situation prevails in that section than prevails in other parts of the country. In Kansas, for instance, the average farm value is $13,735; in Iowa it is $19,655; Illinois, $15,553; in South Dakota, $15,455.

If we are going to establish a man upon a farm, it must be an economic unit upon which he can make a living, and while we are proposing to provide him with a farm, with the equipment, with the supplies, and the facilities we are not proposing to provide him with any capital. I do not know how it may be in Alabama or other States, but in my State one cannot operate a farm without capital with which to buy seed, and so forth.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator know how the Government will ever be able to say to one tenant, "Yea; you may have a farm", and to another tenant, "Nay; you may not have a farm"?

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that it cannot be done. That is the problem. Either the bill we are passing is merely a futile gesture or it is an entering wedge upon a program which will literally destroy the ability of the United States to borrow money. We have passed within a week or two bills involving additional taxes; additional indebtedness has been incurred. We have appropriations to be met by borrowing. Our indebtedness is now approximately $40,000,000,000. Then, when we go out into the markets and borrow we are going to meet trouble. A tax bill is predicted which may lessen our capacity to sell bonds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado on the amendment has expired.

Mr. ADAMS. Then, I will take my time on the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am at a loss, listening to the Senator, to determine whether he thinks we ought to take the whole plunge and go the whole length or whether we ought to defeat the bill entirely.

Mr. ADAMS. I can readily answer the Senator. In my judgment, it is not the function of the Federal Government to buy farms for anybody. I think we have gone the full way in that direction in what we have already done. In other words, if we say that it is the obligation of the Federal Government to provide a farm for every tenant and finance him, I have in my State, as every other Senator has in his State, men who will say, "I want a home"; and there will be an equal demand on the Federal Government to provide him with a home, as our country rests upon the homes as well as upon the farms. I have in my State young men working in foundries and in factories who would like to have a factory or a manufacturing plant of their own. I do not know how we are going to draw the line and say we will finance the farm tenant, but we will not finance the man who desires a home, who desires to operate an industry, who desires to own a store. I think I might say to the Senator from Nebraska not only is it an unwise policy, one financially destructive, but I do not know where, in the Constitution of the United States as it stands today, we can find authority to take money out of the Treasury and use it for the private welfare of an individual.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not trying to belittle the Senator's argument by the question I have asked and by the question which I wish now to ask.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator need not restrict himself.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize just as fully as does the Senator that it is an enormous proposition; yet I should like to get back to the fact whether it would be better for us to do nothing or try to do something, even though we admit that we are not doing as much as we should like to do. I am fearful, I am worried a great deal about the facts which have been accumulating for years, showing that farm tenancy is increasing at a rapid rate; and I confess that, in my anxiety to stop it, I am willing to do some things which under ordinary circumstances I would not think of doing. What would the Senator do? Is there something we can do instead of this to stop the rapid tendency toward farms being tilled by tenants and the owners living somewhere else?

Mr. ADAMS. If I may I shall answer in two aspects. The fact that a situation is deplorable does not necessarily in and of itself impose upon the Federal Government the obligation to remedy it. The fact that a purpose may be noble does not of itself impose upon the Federal Government an obligation to carry it out.

In the State of Nebraska practically every acre of tillable land was at one time in private ownership. All the Midwest Mississippi Valley country was once privately owned. It is the most fertile section not only of this country, but almost of the world. Despite that situation we have seen tenancy increase. What is the cause of it? There are economic causes, agricultural causes. A man cannot hold a farm without marginal resources unless economic conditions are fundamentally sound. What I thought the present Congress and the preceding Congress had been endeavoring to do was to correct the underlying economic causes so that the man on the farm could live. If such a condition could be maintained, we would not have a farm tenancy problem in the State of Nebraska or in the Northern States.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there some other way? Has the Senator in mind some other remedy which would bring about that desirable condition?

Mr. ADAMS. We have tried to remedy several conditions. We have tried to put the farmer on a parity with industry.

Mr. NORRIS. But we have not done so.

Mr. ADAMS. No; but we have tried. We cannot do it merely by putting upon his back an obligation to pay for a farm upon which he cannot make a living under existing conditions. If we could establish conditions upon a sound basis we would have no trouble with the tenant. He would get a farm.

Throughout my section of the country many foreclosures have taken place. In the Senator's State of Nebraska foreclosures have taken place by insurance companies, loan agencies, and banks. They are more than eager to sell and dispose of the farms they hold. All the farms are now in some form of private ownership. The man who does not own his farm in 99 out of 100 cases makes a failure of it. I know in my own State, Colorado, there is no one so eager to get rid of the tenancy situation and to establish ownership as those who own farm property and try to operate it from town.

My theory is that we should improve tax conditions, make it easier for a man to live, take off his back some of the tariff burdens and some of the tax burdens. By such means we will solve the farm tenant's problem.

I do not know a thing about the South so far as this problem is concerned. I am talking about the section of the country with which I am familiar, where the Senator from Nebraska lives and where I live. I feel that this bill would not meet that condition, but would clearly put us in a position where we would have to have a remedy to undertake to cure what is impossible under unsatisfactory economic conditions. We are asked to buy a man a farm and livestock and equipment, and put him on it without capital, and then if there should be a bad year or a drought or low prices he would be perfectly helpless and the Government would have to go into the farming business.

That, in substance, is what I have to say about the bill. The actual number of farmers to be helped is infinitesimal. The first year the number would be one-fourth of 1 percent, with the possibility in 3 years of 2½ percent of those who nominally come under the bill. In other words, it is a program so small that it is not worth considering. It is a futile gesture. If I considered such a program as is proposed to be sound, I should be willing to go along with it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. It seems to me there is only one argument in favor of the pending bill. We enacted a good deal of economic legislation, benevolently intended, passed with the best possible intentions to help the farmers in the South and other sections. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] argued and demonstrated, I believe, a few days ago that in the South the uneconomic legislation which we have already enacted has driven 300,000 tenants and share-croppers in the South from the farms to the towns, has driven 300,000 tenants and share-croppers from the farms to the relief rolls in the towns and in the cities, 30,000 in the State of North Carolina alone. No one anticipated this result, no one desired this result, but that was the unforeseen reaction to uneconomic legislation.

The pending bill is intended in a way to reverse that tendency and to remedy that mischief, to set in operation another set of economic measures to counteract the mistakes we have already made. Since the Government has virtually evicted these tenants who now have no farms to cultivate and has sent them to the relief rolls, does not the Senator think that might possibly be considered as an excuse if not a reason for the Government's doing something of this sort and trying to undo its mistaken policy insofar as the tenant farmers are concerned?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. I do not want it to be assumed, by sitting silent when a statement is made such as that which has just been made, that the Senate acquiesces in it. It seems a little peculiar to me to suggest that the tenant farmers of the South, for instance, have been sent back to the relief rolls on 10- and 12-cent cotton when they would gladly, and in a lordly way, sustain themselves on 4-cent cotton. It seems a little strange to me to suggest that the farmers of the Nation have been sent to the relief rolls on $1 wheat when they could sustain themselves in luxury, and with their rugged initiative and their magnificent ability, on 25-cent wheat. It seems a little strange to me to argue that the farmers have been sent to the relief rolls in America by corn at 75 cents and a dollar a bushel, when corn was so cheap before the depression began that they burned it for fuel in the West, and in many places sold it at 9 and 10 cents a bushel.

It may be possible that in these economic laws there is something of exploitation which is frequently manufactured by those who want to support conditions as they are. There may be something in these economic laws which leads us to believe that 4- and 5-cent cotton will keep men off the relief rolls, that 10- and 12-cent cotton will place them there; that 8-cent corn will keep them off the relief rolls, but 75-cent corn will send them to the relief rolls; that 25-cent wheat will necessarily send the people out to live on their farms, with their rugged initiative standing out uppermost to show how great they are, but when they get a dollar a bushel for their wheat they must go out with hat in hand begging for relief. That may be true, but I cannot agree to such logic.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ADAMS. Gladly.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Alabama has made a perfectly splendid stump speech. It ought to secure the desired reaction upon the part of those to whom it is addressed.

Mr. BLACK. I was addressing it to the Senator from Oklahoma with little hope that it would avail anything.

Mr. GORE. Then I doubly appreciate it. The only fault with the Senator's speech is that it has no reference to the facts. I mention that merely as an incidental infirmity. I would not suggest that as any serious matter to consider in connection with so eloquent an outburst, but I know of cases where landlords, under the A. A. A. and the Bankhead Act, have discharged their tenants and have sent them to town or let them go their way, and have taken their benefits and rental payments and hired farm labor at 50 cents a day and have cultivated the remaining portions of their land. If that commends itself to the Senator from Alabama, I, for one, do not agree with him. I deplore such consequences as that, and the Government ought not to lend its sanction to policies which work such mischief among the tenants of the country who are entitled at least to justice, if not to favor.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The bad thing about the remarks I made, so far as the Senator from Oklahoma is concerned, is that they are the facts, they are the evidence; and those who seek to attack the program which has been brought about are the ones who ignore the facts and who ignore the evidence.

It is easy enough for a man living in luxury or in comfort, or who may be prompted by some malevolent desire to injure an individual holding office, to criticize every part of a program. I shall wait until my time comes to discuss this question further; but I wish it distinctly understood what the facts are, as may be ascertained by any one who will investigate and as the farmers of the country have shown by their votes, and as every man who has gone out among them knows. I went into 61 counties in Alabama last summer. I am not talking from hearsay. I am talking from absolute knowledge of the way those farmers live, and what has happened to them; and I deny that so far as the farmers of Alabama are concerned, any evidence can be secured that they have been sent to the relief rolls on 12-cent cotton when they were rolling in luxury in the good old days of 5-cent cotton.

I shall wait until the time of the Senator from Colorado is up before replying further.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ADAMS. I do.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if anybody is going to contend that under present prices 12-cent cotton is a living.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator from Colorado will yield to me, I do not claim that 12-cent cotton under present prices places agriculture on a parity with industry; but I claim that agriculture is a lot further toward parity with industry on 12-cent cotton than it was on 5-cent cotton. I claim that agriculture is a lot further toward parity with industry on 75-cent corn and $1 corn than it was on 8- and 10-cent corn.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator mean that we shall have to take either Roosevelt or Hoover, and that we can not have anything better?

Mr. BLACK. I think we shall take Roosevelt again, and not take LONG, if that is what the Senator means. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. We shall see about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired on the amendment and on the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment. On page 26, line 8, beginning with the words "No land", I move to strike out the remainder of the sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 26, line 8, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

No land purchased from the Corporation herein created, up to the value of $2,500, shall ever be encumbered with any lien or obligation, either statutory or contractual.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in reference to this particular amendment, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

We are endeavoring to set up a tenant under a purchase from the Government by which he will owe the entire purchase price of his farm and its equipment. The tenant who becomes a landowner, in order that he may operate the farm, will in many instances be compelled to provide capital for feed and for various purposes. We are putting into the bill, however, a provision which will destroy any possibility of the former tenant securing any credit. We are providing that he may never voluntarily encumber the property he purchases, even after he has completed his payments. It is one thing to protect him against involuntary obligations, against his debts, against judgments, and executions; but we are here forbidding the former tenant who becomes the owner from securing credit based upon his ownership of the land, and we make this a permanent disability. It seems to me that limitation should go out, especially when we follow that provision in the bill with a provision that—

Such land shall not be subject to any debt, or debts, or obligations of any kind of the owner, except taxes—and then go on to make that obligation run with the land.

I shall be glad now to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma, if he so desires.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to state that I do not desire the issue between the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and myself to be misunderstood. I am concerned about the tenant farmer who has been obliged to leave the farm, who has no farm products of any sort to sell—no cotton to sell either at 5 cents or at 10 cents; no corn to sell either at 8 cents or at 80 cents; no wheat to sell either at 25 cents or at $1—the tenant farmer who is now on the relief roll.

I do not for one moment suggest that the rental payments and the benefit payments made to farmers in the South and other sections have not brought substantial benefits to them; that the increased prices have not been of substantial benefit to the farmers, particularly to the landlords, and in some instances to the tenants themselves. There are two kinds of payments, rental payments and benefit payments, one of which is shared with the tenants; but 300,000 tenant farmers in the South have recently left the farms, and in the United States as a whole I believe some 850,000 tenants have left the farms and gone elsewhere. Many of them have gone to the relief rolls. That is the point I was emphasizing.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there is one group of persons who will secure great benefits in addition to the tenants if the bill shall pass and its provisions shall be carried through into an enlarged scale, and those will be the owners of land who have land to sell.

This measure might well be called a "landowners' bill." It is designed to enable the owner of undesirable farm land—that is, land that it is undesirable for him to own—to dispose of it to the Government, and then to enable the Government to dispose of it to the farm tenant under such conditions that the farm tenant, supplied with stock, equipment, machinery, and so forth, may live upon it without making any payments for 1, 2, or 3 years.

We are going to have good farmers and poor farmers. The better farmers today are the owners. The poorer farmers are among the tenant class. We propose to put the poor farmer on a good farm, under conditions where he will get the entire crop, as he will under this bill, and he will let his taxes go, let his payments go, and the Government will be a lenient landlord to him, and we shall have a condition which will be most deplorable financially to the Government.

So I think the bill is unsound in departing from sound governmental policies. I think it is unsound from the point of having the Government engage in activities which it is beyond the power of the United States, under the Constitution as it now stands, to engage in. I believe that the bill, limited to its present scope, is a bill which will mislead. It will cause the tenants of the country to think a bill has been passed which will enable them to get farms, when, as I say, only 10,000 farmers out of two and a half million will have farms made available to them; and the Lord be merciful to those who are responsible for this bill when they go home, if it shall be passed, and meet the 99¾ percent of the farmers who think they should be taken care of but who cannot be brought under the bill.

Furthermore, the immediate financing of the bill is taken out of relief funds, which will prevent the construction of projects which the people of the land desire. It seems to me the bill will impair the borrowing capacity of our country, and that in the future it may become somewhat difficult for us to make further loans. I really think this body, having already been rebuked upon several occasions by the Supreme Court, might be a little bit scrupulous in passing upon measures of at least doubtful constitutionality.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I happened to come into the Chamber while the Senators from Oklahoma and Alabama were engaged in a little controversy, and to get the backwash of the remarks of my friend from Alabama, my fellow southerner. I think we have both picked cotton a little and know something about it. I have hoed a little cotton—not any more than I had to hoe—and I never picked any more than I had to pick, when the purchasers were paying about 15 and 16 cents a pound for it. It is too hard work for me. Then we were allowed to pick and plant all the cotton we wanted to, and things cost much less than they do now when we had 15-cent cotton. I cannot, however, fail to supplement the remarks of my friend from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] with this additional statement, which we all know to be true:

I should like to know what is our policy. I should like to vote for any policy that is consistent. Is it the policy to restrict production or to encourage production? We have just gone out for another year and signed up everybody not to raise stuff to eat. We have just gone out and signed up the cotton farmers not to raise cotton to pick. In my old country in Louisiana, where the grass was higher than my head, they killed the cows on the ground that there was a drought, although the grass was so high that I could not get to my own place; they killed the cows and laid them out there because there was nothing for them to eat, no water to drink, or anything of the kind!

What I should like to find out occasionally is this: What is the policy? If we are going one way, we are likely to get somewhere. It may not be the best place in the world, but eventually, if we keep going in any one direction, with any one policy, we are likely to get to the end of the rainbow. But when we go out in the month of March and sign up a man not to plant any cotton, and to take his colored labor in the South off his own pay roll and put them on the relief roll—and that has been done; I can give the Senate all the names and dates it wishes to have me send to get to prove that that is true, and I do not understand that it is disputed—when we have restricted planting, and have restricted acreage, and have signed up farmers and paid them a bounty not to plant, and a bounty to plough under, and a bounty not to raise this and not to raise that, and now we propose to go back to the same man and lend him a wad of money to go into the farming business, what is this thing we are doing? That is what I want to find out. What is it? I do not know. I realize that I have not the literacy that Senators are more or less supposed to have; but what is it we are doing? Are we going to sign up a farmer in 1935, this very year, not to plant cotton, and put him on the relief rolls, and then loan him money to go back and plant cotton after we have moved him off his farm, and go back next year and pay him again not to raise cotton?

Perhaps that is consistent. My friend from Alabama is a smart man. I do not disagree with him politically on many things. I think he thinks about as I do on most things. He does not vote as I think all the time, and I do not either. [Laughter.] I should like, however, to be able to tell these people, when I go back, "We are going to do this", or "we are going to do something else." I should like to vote for a consistent policy. If this is farm relief, all right; but now the Senator from Alabama brings up another point.

We have decided that the share-tenant business is bad; and so, of the 100 percent, we are going to provide for one-fourth of 1 percent and leave 99¾ percent without a dime. How is that going to look? I go out there and I get on the stump with those people and I am trying to get their votes—and, God knows, I need them—and I say to them, "See what I have done for you." I am good at that myself. I always try to let them know what I have done for them. I have done so little that I state it twice so that they will not forget it.

"See what I have done for you. I voted for a law that means that every living man here has a right to go and get a loan from the United States Government, if he owns a farm, giving a mortgage, and he can give the farm to the Government the next year."

I would never go and tell a farmer that I fixed it for him to go in debt on his farm unless I had it explained to him that he could go off and let the Government take it the next year. So I would say, "I voted for a bill to give you money to own a farm one-fourth of 1 percent, and there are 99¾ percent out there who cannot get a copper cent."

Manifestly the only thing for me to do is to get out of the country; and I give my colleagues some good political advice. Do not ever put one of these Mother Hubbard things out that is going to accommodate just 1 percent. Unless it is a fine thing, we are making a proposal which, from the Government's standpoint, is disastrous.

I do not propose to vote for the pending bill. I would not think of voting for a thing like this. Do you think I would vote for a bill which would mean that I would go back and tell the people that the best they could hope for would be to have one-fourth of one man out of every hundred to get a loan, and that 99¾ of them would not get loans? Do you think I would do that? I have better sense than to do that. I had better sense than that before I ever went to school, and the Senate has better sense.

I will come back to another thing, repetition as it is. What is the policy? Is the policy not to plant and not to raise, or is it the policy to plant? We cannot go both ways at the same time. I want to say to my learned friends of the Committee on Agriculture that the time has come when they, with their good sound sense—and they have as good as anybody—are going to have to adopt a farm policy for the Senate, and not depend upon one bill coming from one source at one time and another bill coming from another source the next time, and perhaps another one coming from some Member of the Senate.

If we continue this policy for a few years more I hesitate to say where the agricultural condition will finally lead us. Some days ago I mentioned a town, and I will mention it again, the town of Arcadia, La., where they put the colored folks on the relief rolls because they cut the acreage down and they gave the poor colored man about $4 or $5 a week relief. In order that the white man there who has been working his colored labor will be able to make enough cotton to take care of himself and his family, and not to divide what is made off the land between himself and the colored people, they have taken the colored people and moved them into town, where they have no gardens, where they do not raise any turnips, they do not raise any radishes, they do not raise any snap beans, they do not raise a thousand other things they might cook and eat, but they put them in town a few miles off the farm and give them $4 or $5 worth of store-bought grub and sign up the foreman and the owner under some contract.

Now, we go back to the colored man—and that is the man who is generally the tenant—there are more colored people tenants than of any other class of people in my part of the country. There are plenty of white people who are tenants, but I am using the colored merely for the illustration. You go back to that man today and say, "We are going to lend you some money to put you back on relief."

"How much cotton can I raise?"

"If you raise any cotton, we will have to cut down the amount John Smith is allowed to raise, because we moved him away from Old Sparta last year so that the cotton that is to be raised in that country would not have to be divided between all of you."

So if you move the same man back down there and put him on the farm you must necessarily restrict the amount of cotton that the old man who had him hired there last year was raising, because why did you move him off last year if you were going to move him back there, unless you are going to abandon your cotton-restriction program?

There is another thing that statistics show. I do not believe in hiding these facts. I would vote for this bill if I thought it was anything right. I have a liberal record in the Congress. I have voted for every liberal measure that has been offered since I have been here that was sensible or half sensible, which I thought, according to my limited mentality, was sensible or half sensible. But I do not want to think of going back and telling these people that law after law, as to which I must admit some of doubtful constitutionality has been enacted, and that I have done nothing except to propound and to propose and to support this kind of legislation for the relief of agriculture or industry, or anything else.

What is the condition of these farmers today? I say to my friend from Alabama that a paper in New Orleans which is very much opposed to me, thank God, published an editorial as to our farm program a while back, and it showed that, taking the price of cotton as it existed under Hoover, and taking the price of cotton as it existed under Roosevelt, the farmer could buy less for a bale of cotton under Roosevelt than he could buy for a bale of cotton under Hoover.

I am no Hoover man. God help us if we get down to the point where we have to make a choice between what we have right now and what we had under Hoover. I would certainly go fishing on that day. [Laughter.]

I am not advocating any Hoover policy. I hope my friend from Alabama does not charge that to me. He makes the suggestion that he would take Roosevelt instead of LONG. Do not be too hasty about that, because I might have a good parade to offer before we get through. I never bar myself from anybody away in advance. I am always open to propositions as they occur in these changing cycles of time. So that I do not want a good politician like my friend from Alabama to make too many attempts to put me in or out of the picture.

If the figures to which I have referred are true and we can buy less of the necessities of life with a bale of cotton now than we did last year, or the year before, or the year before that, the point I am making is that, although you may put men on the relief and although you may be appropriating enough money out of the Federal Treasury to cover up that situation, nonetheless, in the essence of affairs, things are bound to be getting worse and worse as time goes on, and some day everybody is going to have to pay for it.

There have been benefits from this extra $10,000,000,000. I certainly would not be one of those who would say that if a billion dollars was put out among the people it would not buy something. I certainly would not deny that somebody ought to have gotten some good or that everybody ought to have gotten some good, having mortgaged themselves for ten or fifteen billion dollars, which they are going to have to pay some day. But I would like to see a policy for the farm people of this country that meant that more or less every man could farm who wanted to farm; that would mean that if the people desired to have the right to buy farms, they would not have to be one of the elect out of one-fourth of a hundred percent.

As was said here the other day by my friend the Senator from Nebraska, when we were debating another bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Louisiana on the amendment has expired.

Mr. LONG. I should like to speak on the bill. Have I 10 minutes on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 15 minutes on the bill if he desires to use it.

Mr. LONG. I hope I will not use it all. The Chair, by his expression, seems to agree with that statement. [Laughter.]

My friend the Senator from Nebraska said, when we had another bill before us the other day—I have forgotten what bill it was—

There is that much good in the bill.

That is true. There may be some little good in the bill, but there is also harm in the bill when we go to the people who have been suffering 4 or 5 years and undertake to tell them that we are going to give them some relief. When we tell them that we are going to pick 1 out of 400 and give him something, and turn 399 down, which we have to do, as I understand the figures given here by the Senator from Colorado, we do not do them good. We do them absolute harm, because they have to enter into some kind of a political jigger as to which one of the 400 is going to get the particular money that is spent.

I do not care how you write this thing; you can put all the civil-service protection around it you want to, it is going to be politically administered. Such a law always will be. You cannot have a thing administered by public officials that is not politically administered. But if you provide for everybody evenly, then politics cannot get into it. When you provide for 1 out of 400, politics becomes disastrous in the administration of the Government's relief program.

I should like to have an answer to the question I again propound. What is the policy we are following? Do we propose to continually restrict production? If so, let us do it. Do we propose to give the farmers the right to raise not more than eight or nine bales of cotton, where the very people on the cotton farms have not clothing enough on their backs today to cover them? Are we to put them back under a restriction proposition, or are we going to adopt some kind of a reasonable farm program?

There has been entirely too much bitterness in the Senate if anybody proposes anything different from what comes from the Government departments. It is almost a crime; it is looked upon as almost a reprehensible thing in itself, when one of the "brain trusters" walks onto the floor of the Senate and shakes his head to an amendment, for a Senator to persist. I have seen them run right down the aisle by me and shake their heads, and thereupon give advice and admonition either to the Senator in charge of the bill, or to some other Senator, that it would be against the policy of the department to have this or to have that amendment.

I know that when one of these bills comes in any amendments are looked upon with a ferocious belligerency which almost spoils the friendly contact and almost destroys the right to give one another advice and suggestion here in undertaking to pass legislation.

I would rather say to my friend from Alabama, or to my friend from Colorado, or my colleague from Louisiana, "Let us take your parish"—we call them parishes in Louisiana—"or take your county", as they call them in the other 47 States, "or let us take my parish." We are allowed to raise so many bales of cotton in Wynn Parish, my home parish. So many people have been compelled to leave the farms. We are going to be allowed to raise only so many thousand bales of cotton.

Whether the number be 100, 200, 300, or 1,000 farmers, they have left the farms because the limit of cotton we are allowed to raise here is so much, and there is no work there for those hands; and so we had to put them on the relief rolls, and locate them in town. And now we are going to say to those people, "We are getting you money from the Government. For what? To move you back out onto the farm. For what? To raise more stuff in this parish? No, not to raise any more stuff, because we have limits there which the parishes have got to respect, otherwise it will conflict with the program of limiting what is to be produced." It all runs into an impossible situation under the restrictions which have been imposed; so that even in the cotton fields the cotton pickers have not enough clothes to clothe them even in the summertime, let alone in the wintertime.

I am not going to vote for any more of this kind of legislation. I would not have voted for this bill the last time we had it before us. I am not afraid to vote against it, either—not a bit at all. I have too much sense to put my head in this kind of a halter. I would not think of supporting this kind of legislation and going back to my people in the State of Louisiana and telling them I voted for a share-tenant bill when I voted for a thing like this.

Let me say that. It is bad enough to have had experience which was not pleasant. Experience is a dear teacher. There is an old saying that experience is a dear teacher, but it is a terrible thing when you have had to pay the cost of experience that it still does not teach you anything. We have been going at this thing for 3 years, gentlemen of the Senate. We did not start it under Mr. Roosevelt entirely. We started some of it under Mr. Hoover. Mr. Roosevelt did not start the relief roll. That was started under the R. F. C. under Mr. Hoover. He started the relief roll, and he started some of these farm programs, most of which we would not pass for him at the time. If experience is a dear teacher, how much worse is it if the experience which has been bought at such a terrible cost still does not teach us a thing upon God's earth? I pause for a Senator on this floor to tell me how we are to make consistent two policies of this Congress, one of which is to limit the production and move people away from the farms, and the other of which is, with the limited production prevailing, to move the same people back on the farm again and tell them, "You are going to buy this place with Government money."

Mr. KING. And have to borrow the money.

Mr. LONG. He will not borrow the money. Here is what these people will do. I know them. I have been messed up with them. I remember when the Federal land bank started in Louisiana. I was appointed attorney in my territory for the Federal land bank. That was so much better than what we are now proposing that the two measures are not even close. In that case there was no limitation of production, there were no relief rolls, and all that sort of business. I saw that what those men were doing, in 9 cases out of 10, was picking up some little fellow not worth a 5-cent piece and have him buy a place that belonged to them, which they wanted to get rid of, and borrow all the money he could from the Federal land bank with which to buy the place. They would pay the man for buying the place, and then they would move him off of it.

The big landowner down there was doing another thing. He would pick up some colored man or some white man and say to him, "I do not want to sign that note, because I would be personally responsible for it, but you want to buy a place. Now, you just come here and make application to buy this place, and then move right off after you get the money that you are going to pay me, and that is the end of that."

They are going to sell the Government more land. The Government is already making them do it. This bill would compel them to commit a fraud, because we are only permitting them to raise a certain amount of produce in a community, and we are giving them more money with which to raise that limited amount.

Here is what they are going to do with this little old "pie dough" money. I know these "birds"; I know what they will do. They will call a little colored man down there who has been removed from the farm and placed on the relief roll, and they will say to him, "Come here, Mose; sign your name." [Laughter.] "They are going to move you on this ground. Sign your name." And he signs his name, and that is all the colored man is going to get out of it, and they are going to sell about 30 acres of land down there which otherwise they could not sell, and which has already probably been mortgaged for double what they could get for it under the hammer, and the United States will be filched, conservatively speaking, to the extent of from 50 percent to 75 percent more money than it should take to buy land they are going to pretend to sell to the little colored man. If land is going to be sold to one, let us sell it to all. Let us permit them all to have a farm. Do not let us go down there and give 1 man out of 400 a farm. Let them all have one. If we permit all to have farms, then let us make one further provision; let us not limit the production and say "We have too much produce", and make contracts to limit the amount which is going to be raised on those places, and then still try to put people back on the farms, when those who are there now are not allowed to raise enough to support themselves in anything like respectable poverty.

I do not care whether we pass the bill or not. It will not be much worse than we are doing in some other respects. I am not going to vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOORE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may we have the amendment of the Senator from Colorado again stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 26, line 8, after the word "payable", it is proposed to strike out the following words:

No land purchased from the Corporation herein created up to the value of $2,500 shall ever be encumbered with any lien or obligation, either statutory or contractual.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment, though I have no doubt it will receive the earnest support of the Senator from Alabama. Those of us in the West have had some experience with reclamation and irrigation projects. Men have come from the East and from other sections, and entered upon lands which were to be cultivated under the reclamation projects. As stated by the Senator from Colorado it is necessary that they obtain capital in order to maintain their families and establish homes. I have seen many persons who have gone upon the arid lands for the purpose of developing them, and establishing homes. After they had exhausted their small capital, perhaps $1,000 to $2,000 or $3,000, they have had nothing left other than the land itself.

In many cases before title was obtained from the Government, the settlers could not obtain credit, and were compelled to abandon the land and sustain the losses to which they had been subjected. When they obtained title they were then permitted to mortgage the land and obtain credit with which to continue their operations. I concede that some persons who may take advantage of this bill, if they were permitted to incumber the same, might act improvidently and execute mortgages for the purpose of obtaining credit when possibly they might have "pulled through", to use the language of the street, without mortgaging and possibly losing their homes.

However, generally speaking, if those who acquire farms and are industrious and frugal will not mortgage their farms unless under such circumstances as will enable them to foresee emancipation from their obligations and to make reasonably sure that they are going to make a success of the venture.

So, notwithstanding there will be some evils resulting and some loss of property from debts improvidently incurred, I think the advantages which will result from permitting them to obtain credit, as indicated by the Senator from Colorado, outweigh the disadvantages and dangers which may result.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has presented some facts which I think are worthy of consideration. In my opinion, if this bill becomes law, efforts will be made by landowners to dispose of some of their holdings to the Government—holdings which have not been profitable to the owners. I think there is ample evidence to sustain the proposition that the policy of the Government, in restricting the production of cotton and some other agricultural commodities, has resulted in increasing the number of tenant farmers, particularly in some of the cotton States. My recollection is that when the so-called "Bankhead cotton bill" was under consideration at the last session of Congress the statement was made that it would result in restricting production; that it would disastrously affect tenants and the so-called "small croppers." When the Department of Agriculture put into operation its policy of materially restricting the production of cotton, thousands of small farmers and tenants were the principal sufferers. The tenants were driven from the farms and many of them onto the relief rolls.

I have heard it stated by persons familiar with the facts that there are thousands of tenant farmers now on the relief rolls who had it not been for the unsound and unwise policy of the Government with respect to the limitation of the production of cotton would have been engaged in agricultural pursuits to their advantage as well as to the advantage of their landlords. The philosophy of the Department of Agriculture seems to have been that the creation of wealth is a mistake; that it is imperative that cattle and livestock be destroyed, and that the production of wheat and corn and cotton and other commodities be materially restricted.

It has been the accepted doctrine that wealth results from production; from the creative genius and thrift and the industry of the people; but our present philosophy seems to be that scarcity produces wealth. There are in the United States today millions of people who do not have a sufficient supply of food and clothing, and yet under the prevailing philosophy this policy of restriction is to be continued. Millions of acres of land have been withdrawn from production, and millions of dollars paid the owners by way of bounties and subsidies. The owners have been paid large sums not to farm their land. I have heard of many cases where landowners have received large payments from the Government for withholding land from cultivation though they did not intend to cultivate it. A friend of mine told me a few days ago that he had received five payments but had refused to cash the checks because the lands had not been cultivated and he did not intend to cultivate them.

I am told that hundreds of millions of dollars have been distributed by the Department of Agriculture to landowners in the execution of what I regard as an unsound and absurd plan, but we are to continue this policy, as I am advised, of paying the landowners enormous sums of money for not planting crops. Fields are to lie idle; productive lands are to remain fallow; weeds are to grow where crops should be produced; and paralleling this absurd policy is the plan embodied in this bill to purchase lands which perhaps have been productive and attempt to establish and place former tenant farmers upon the same in order that crops may be produced. On the one hand, the Government lavishly dispenses its bounties to landowners, subsidizing them for not producing crops, and at the same time purchases their lands, or other lands, some of which doubtless are fallow, and places persons upon the same in order to grow crops. There is no logic or consistency in the course which has been pursued; and this measure, in my opinion, is confirmative of the folly of the course which has been pursued by some of the executive agencies of the Government. Crops have been destroyed and pigs have been slaughtered.

Scarcity has been urged as a necessity and now to mitigate some of the evils resulting from this course, we are asked to authorize an appropriation of hundreds of millions of dollars and to provide for a bond issue of $1,000,000,000. Undoubtedly the Bankhead cotton bill is largely responsible for this unjustifiable experiment which, as I have stated, is doomed to failure. There have been too many doctrinaires, impracticable and theoretical persons engaged in formulating and executing some of the policies of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, I condemn the doctrine that our country can become prosperous by destroying wealth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot, of course, speak authoritatively about individual cases, but the Senator from Utah must realize that farmers are making very much more out of their crops since this plan was evolved and put into effect than they previously made, and they are very greatly satisfied with it.

Mr. KING. I am not in agreement with the statement made by the Senator. Undoubtedly there are some persons who have been benefited by the course to which I have referred. But I respectfully insist that by and large the policy pursued has proven disadvantageous and has retarded recovery. The contention is made by some that we must establish parity between industry and agriculture, and the agricultural prices in 1926 are frequently referred to as the goal to be achieved. There is no doubt that a number of years ago the agricultural products of the United States exceeded in volume and in value those produced during the past 2 or 3 years.

Mr. President, cotton farmers of the United States, when they were producing from 15,000,000 to 18,000,000 bales per annum and shipping abroad 60 percent of their production, were far better off than they have been under the policies which have been enforced by the Agriculture Department during the past 2 years. Our total exports a few years ago reached the high level of $8,000,000,000, and our foreign trade amounted to as much as $13,000,000,000. With tariff restrictions and unwise and unsound domestic policies, our foreign trade has been reduced until during the past year it amounted to considerably less than $4,000,000,000.

What we need in the United States is greater production and greater consumption. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] referred to the fact that in the United States there were many persons who lacked sufficient cotton clothing, and, if I understood him correctly, he contended that there should be an increase in the production of cotton and of agricultural crops. It seems to me that all must accept the view that what is needed in the world today is increased production, which will be followed by increased consumption. It is true that by this policy of destroying cattle and other products there has been an increase in prices. Senators know that prices in a number of commodities, among them meat, have reached such levels as to restrict consumption. We read in the papers of buyers' strikes because of the alleged abnormally high prices of such commodities.

Mr. President, there are those who believe that by ignoring the economic laws and policies which have made our country great we can surmount all difficulties and reach the summits of prosperity, indeed, of affluence. Coupled with the philosophy of some of the doctrinaires who are in part responsible for some of our recent policies, there are those who are carrying on aggressive campaigns for the socialization of business and of industry. There are those who would destroy the foundations of our economic and political system and plunge our Government into the arms of a national capitalistic state or an enervating and destructive socialistic regime.

There are some in important places in the Government who are loudly clamoring for a modification of our Government; who are demanding that the power of the Federal Government should be greatly augmented; that the rights of the States should be reduced to a vanishing point and that individuals should be subjected to a regimentation destructive of initiative and of that proper individualism essential not only to individual, but to State and national growth and progress.

Mr. President, I believe in our form of government; that the fathers of this Republic were wiser than some of the doctrinaires and faddists who are trying to force their philosophy upon the American people. The philosophy of Jefferson and the principles of Washington and Lincoln have builded the greatest nation the world has ever seen. This Republic, if it follows the teachings of the fathers, and adheres to Democratic principles and Democratic ideals, will continue to lead the world and will be the standard-bearer of liberty and progress among all the nations.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, as I understand this bill, the corporation proposed to be created by it may loan a sufficient amount of money to pay the appraised value of the farms proposed therein to be purchased. Under the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], indebtedness also may be incurred and liens may be filed against the land so purchased in addition to the mortgage. There was one thing about this bill which I thought had merit, and that was that the land would be exempt from lien of any character except the mortgage held by the corporation.

Knowing a little something about farm conditions during the last 40 or 50 years, I cannot understand how any man can borrow money to the full appraised value of his farm, then borrow whatever more he can, and mortgage his farm even beyond its appraised value, carry the fixed charges, and make sufficient money to provide a decent living upon that farm. He will have a very hard time to do so if he is permitted to do no more than to borrow sufficient money to pay the full appraised value of the farm; but if we let him borrow any more we will load him down with fixed charges and overhead which, over a period of time, will tie him to the farm for the remainder of his life; he will not be able to get away if we permit him to incur such an amount of indebtedness. Far better than that would be the position of a renter. At least in my section of the country he would be far better off as a renter than to be saddled down with fixed charges that can be piled upon him by this increased indebtedness even beyond the full appraisal of the land. If I were a farmer, I should not for 5 minutes undertake to settle on a farm where I had to borrow the full value of the farm and then borrow sufficient with which to buy machinery, cattle, horses, and seed. The farmers had a hard time when they acquired their land free as homesteads, but they made a success; they had virgin soil; their local township, county, and State taxes were very low. Now they are very high. The farmer must not only pay the interest on this mortgage but he must pay the local, county, and State taxes. So, it seems to me the amendment of the Senator from Colorado will make it possible to saddle down the farmer even more than was ever contemplated by the bill or was contemplated by those who levy taxes upon farm lands.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber when the Senator from Colorado offered his amendment, but, as I understand, the Senator seeks by his amendment to strike from the bill the following language:

> No land purchased from the Corporation herein created up to the value of $2,500 shall ever be encumbered with any lien or obligation, either statutory or contractual.

If I do not have the correct idea of the amendment, I should be glad to have the Chair inform me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I want to speak on that amendment.

As I see it, if this amendment shall prevail it will be a blow against successful operation of the proposed law. The effect of the bill now is that these farms purchased by the corporation shall be exempt from levy by execution, by mortgage, or by any other means. Ordinarily, I presume, in every State in the Union there is provision for the exemption of the homestead from debts. This bill would extend that provision and make it impossible to mortgage the homestead. That is a provision which it seems to me is wise. A homestead never ought to be mortgaged or allowed to be mortgaged except, perhaps, for a part of the purchase of the land itself.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senator will permit me just in a word to explain the purpose of the amendment, let me say that I was thinking in offering the amendment of the farmer who had bought from the Government his property and paid for it but struck a bad year or had a bad crop and needed to borrow money to replenish, for instance, his livestock or perhaps for living expenses. Under this bill he could have no credit, that is, so far as his land is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. No; he could not.

Mr. ADAMS. The amendment was designed merely to permit him voluntarily to secure credit which he might desperately need.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I understand the Senator's motive. It is a perfectly honorable one, a perfectly worthy one, and, at first blush, it looks to be the right thing to do; but the homestead laws in nearly every State are to a great extent perverted and nullified by the fact that the owner of the homestead can give a mortgage and thus relieve himself from the protection which the homestead law is intended to supply. There would be instances, as the Senator from Colorado has said, where it would probably work to the owner's benefit if he had a right to mortgage his homestead, but ninety-nine times out of one hundred the homestead is lost, not in the payment of a judgment, but in the payment of a mortgage. The permission given by law to put a mortgage on a homestead has been the means, in practical effect, of taking away the benefits which otherwise would have accrued because of the exemption allowed for a homestead under the law.

In my judgment every man who has had any experience with litigation believes that an exemption law for the homestead is absolutely justifiable, although there might be cases where, in the event of a drought or crop failure, it would be of benefit to some particular homesteader if his homestead could be subject to mortgage. As a general rule, that principle does not apply, and that is the reason for all homesteads being allowed, by the laws of the various States, to be free from execution for any debt excepting a mortgage. This provision goes one step further.

I presume it has been the experience of other Senators, as it has been mine, to have seen title to land in whole counties or whole communities in a new country such as the West, where the land was being settled, changed completely through the foreclosure of mortgages on homesteads. The Federal law granting homes, under which most of the great West was settled, exempted such homesteads from execution for debt, but the first thing that happened, as a rule, when the farmer proved up his homestead, was that he placed a mortgage on it. Then when the mortgage came due, five-sixths of the time or nine-tenths of the time he lost his homestead by virtue of that mortgage.

Such an experience demonstrates conclusively to my mind that we ought to have some provision of this kind in the bill. I will admit, for argument's sake, that it does not make any difference whether one is in favor of the bill or not, even if he is opposed to it, it seems to me he ought to be opposed to the amendment. Even if a Senator is opposed to the bill he ought to be at least willing to go so far as to help make the bill as effective as possible if it should become the law.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. What about discrimination? Here is one man living on a Government-purchased homestead on one side of the road. Across the road is another man living on a privately procured piece of land as to which he has only the exemption provided for in the State law. Would it not create a discrimination as between citizens of the same community?

Mr. NORRIS. It would give an advantage to the man who got his homestead through the operation of this bill. What the States ought to do, what I have believed in for years, is to make it impossible for a man to mortgage a homestead. Let a man have a homestead exempt from mortgaging, as we now make it exempt from execution for the payment of ordinary debts. Let it be also exempt from mortgaging, so that no matter what happens his home may be free, and he will have a foundation upon which to make a fresh start if any calamity should overtake him.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have just received a letter from the Federal Housing Corporation. They are advertising to the public at large urging them to make applications to repair their homes. In red letters along the edge of the letter they list the various kinds of repairs which the Federal Housing Corporation will finance, such as new bedrooms, new tile, different types of floors, and various other kinds of repairs. That is an invitation by the Government to a person to mortgage his home to pay for the repairs on the installment plan.

Mr. NORRIS. That is much the same as mortgaging a homestead to buy it from the Government. I am not going to be led into a discussion of whether the procedure to which the Senator from Iowa calls attention is a good one or bad. Much can be said on either side. It is sufficient to say, as I see it, that it has nothing whatever to do with the question now pending to strike out the exemption feature.

I appeal to Senators, whether they believe in the bill or not—and I admit there are many appealing arguments against it—if we are going to pass the bill let us have one which will be a real homestead law, which will protect the homestead against execution for the payment of any debt. It is not a hardship upon the creditor. The man who lends money, the man who sells something on time to one of these homesteaders, knows in the beginning what the law is. He knows that the man has a homestead which is exempt from execution, and that it cannot be taken for the payment of debts; that he cannot get a mortgage on it.

Conceding that both parties are honest, if I were running a store and a man wanted to get credit from me for groceries or hardware, I would rather give credit to the man who could not mortgage his homestead than to give it to the man who could, because I would know that no matter what happened he would have a nest egg left, and something upon which he could base his hope for the payment of his debts. On the other hand, if he could mortgage his homestead he might, if he wanted to do so, defeat the payment of an ordinary debt for groceries or hardware. Assuming an honest homesteader, and most of them will be honest men who want to pay their debts, when a homesteader contracts for groceries or hardware he will be considered a better risk because he will be bound always to have something upon which he can make a start in case calamity overtakes him, and he will not be thrown out in the cold with his family. It will be known to the hardware dealer and the grocer that this man will have his farm left no matter what may happen. If he is honest he is going to pay, and he will have the ability to pay because he will have a farm upon which, under ordinary circumstances, he can make some money with which to pay his debts.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON. If a purchaser had liquidated his claim to the Government and had received title in fee from the Government, I wonder whether or not the Government could continue to impose a covenant running with the land that it should not be subject to mortgage?

Mr. NORRIS. It may be the Senator has raised a constitutional question. It would be queer indeed if we should enact a law wherein a constitutional question was not raised somewhere along the line. It may be that some court would hold it to be unconstitutional. I would be in favor of it just the same. I would give the court an opportunity to be right and to say that the provision was constitutional. I believe the court would so say. Of course, that is only my opinion. The opinion of the court might be different. A different opinion might be rendered if some other man were to pass upon the question. However, it is done with the best of motives, namely, to save men's homes. If the courts afterward say, "You tried to save the homes of these men, but you have not done it, and we shall not allow you to do it", at least the responsibility will have been taken off our shoulders.

I desire to say to the Senate that, in my judgment, if we pass this bill, we ought to leave this language in the bill. Much as I respect the judgment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], I think in this instance he is absolutely wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am in sympathy with the thought which the Senator from Nebraska expresses. The question arises in my mind, however, as to the practical application of the language which the Senator from Nebraska is now discussing. I should like also the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The language is:

No land purchased from the Corporation herein created up to the value of $2,500 shall ever be encumbered with any lien or obligation, either statutory or contractual.

The particular words to which I now refer are the words "up to the value of $2,500." How would that provision be worked out?

Let me use an illustration. Take the case of a home which has acquired a value of, say, $6,000. What would be the privilege of the home owner in that case? Could he execute a mortgage, and, if so, how would it be executed?

Mr. NORRIS. Possibly. I am acquainted with one State, and I think most States have similar provisions, where in their exemption laws they provide——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska on the amendment has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not desire to speak on the bill while this amendment is pending, because I expect to use that time later.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will take the floor on the amendment for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Nebraska to give thought to that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is a practical question which I am asking, and I should like to know the views of the Senator from Alabama regarding it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the usual procedure, as indicated by the Senator from Nebraska, is that where a State law gives an exemption in value, as most of them do to a certain amount, and the value of the homestead exceeds that amount, the equity court, or whatever court has jurisdiction, works out the matter so that in the event of a sale of the home the amount of the exemption is preserved for the homesteader.

Mr. ROBINSON. Two thousand five hundred dollars of the proceeds would be preserved for the home owner?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; $2,500 of the proceeds would be preserved.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not quite hear the statement of the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I say, the usual system in the States is that a limitation both in area and particularly in value is established as a homestead exemption. Where the value of the homestead exceeds the exemption, the court, on a sale, carves out the amount of the exemption for the benefit of the homesteader to put into another home.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language, however, provides that no land purchased from the Corporation shall ever be encumbered with any lien or obligation, either statutory or contractual, up to the value of $2,500.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That protects the land up to that value from an incumbrance. It does not prevent an incumbrance, but up to that amount the land is not covered by the incumbrance, and the homesteader is protected in that amount.

Mr. ROBINSON. I know there are States where there is a value which is exempt to the home owner.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. It is necessary, I think, that a maximum amount be fixed; otherwise there might be an injustice. Various things might happen to make one of these homesteads worth $100,000, and it would be manifestly unfair to keep all that amount exempt; so I think there ought to be a limitation in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree to that; but it does not appear to me that I have made clear the thought I was trying to express.

There is a provision that the land shall not be encumbered "with any obligation or lien."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Up to $2,500.

Mr. ROBINSON. It comes back again to the question, "up to $2,500."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and, in excess of that amount, it can be encumbered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield with reference to this language?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. The language is not limited to the purchaser from the Government. It says:

No land purchased from the Corporation * * * shall ever be encumbered.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is what I have been trying to say—that there is a prohibition against encumbering the land. No lien can be created up to the value of $2,500. It is a very difficult thing to express; but the point I am making is that the land cannot be mortgaged at all, under this language, so far as the value of $2,500 is concerned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There cannot be a lien up to that amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	Logan	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Costigan	Lonergan	Reynolds
Austin	Davis	Long	Robinson
Bachman	Dickinson	McAdoo	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	McCarran	Schall
Bankhead	Donahey	McGill	Schwellenbach

Connally	La Follette	Pope

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on page 23 of the committee amendment, line 2, following the word "loans", I move to strike out the words "or grants, or both."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 23, line 2, after the word "loans", it is proposed to strike out the words "or grants, or both."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I offer to the committee amendment the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 20, line 24, after the word "person", it is proposed to insert "outside the civil service law."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. To the committee amendment I offer another amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 20, line 25, it is proposed to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$6,000."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask to have that amendment restated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 20, line 24, was adopted. The proviso as printed in the bill reads:

That the appointment of any person receiving a salary of $4,000 or more per annum from the funds of the Corporation shall be subject to the confirmation of the Senate of the United States.

Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming, any one in the civil service would not be subject to confirmation; and that would virtually nullify this provision, because these employees would be appointed only from those in the civil service. I hope that amendment will be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee moves to reconsider the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment. The amendment which it is proposed to reconsider will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 20, line 24, after the word "person", there have been inserted the words "outside the civil-service law."

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I raised no objection to the reconsideration of the vote, because I thought it was very advisable that there should be a statement in the RECORD of the purpose of the amendment, and of the effect of the bill as it now stands.

Earlier in the day we adopted an amendment, offered by the Senator from Minnesota, which provided that attorneys might be appointed without reference to the civil-service laws. Every other employee in the commission, under the terms of the bill as reported by the committee, and under the terms of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, must be appointed from the civil-service register. In other words, the civil-service law is made applicable to all appointments under the bill with the exception of attorneys.

The provision which the amendment which I have offered seeks to amend reads as follows:

Provided, That the appointment of any person receiving a salary of $4,000 or more per annum from the funds of the corporation shall be subject to confirmation by the Senate.

I submit that that provision amounts to a change of the civil-service law, because it means that no person, whether he passes a civil-service examination or not, if he is appointed to a place carrying a salary of $4,000, may be appointed unless he is confirmed by the Senate.

It will wreck the entire civil-service system. As that operates now, in the scientific and professional branches of the service, for example, a man acquiring a civil-service status is appointed at $3,800 a year, let us say. He earns a promotion. His promotions may go up to about $4,400, under the Classification Act of 1923.

This amendment means that no civil-service employee could be promoted to a $4,000 position, or to any position carrying a salary above that, without obtaining confirmation by the Senate, and I do not believe it is the intention of the Senate to provide that the civil-service law should be wrecked in that manner.

I think there can be no objection at all to confirmation by the Senate of persons who are outside of the civil service, but when we undertake in this bill to provide that civil-service employees must obtain confirmation by the Senate, then we are undermining the entire civil-service system, and we might just as well understand it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. May I inquire how it would undermine the civil-service system? A man could retain his position in the civil service.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The object of the civil-service law was to build up a personnel in which a man or a woman could be promoted from one place to another as the result of efficiency.

We all know, from our familiarity with the executive departments of the Government, that there are numerous employees, probably thousands, drawing salaries of $4,000 or more, who are occupying subordinate positions. They do not occupy key positions; they occupy subordinate positions. This provision would mean that those in charge of the Commission would be deprived of any reasonable authority to make promotions within the service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Suppose a person is on the civil-service register and has a position; and, because of his efficiency, those who have charge of the organization to be set up would like to have his services, they suggest his name; and it is sent to the Senate by the President of the United States. It would seem to me that the fact that he has a civil-service status would practically insure his prompt confirmation by the Senate, so that it would not be a disadvantage but rather an advantage to the man, and would probably insure his appointment and his promotion, perhaps, to a position better than that he was occupying.

ALASKAN COLONIZATION BY F. E. R. A.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to take advantage of the pending amendment to put into the RECORD some additional information regarding the Alaskan experiment, about which the Senate has requested a report from Director Hopkins. I had hoped that the report of Director Hopkins would be available today, because it has some bearing, as a matter of fact, upon the proposed legislation now pending before the Senate.

It has been stated that the pending bill is the first proposal that has ever been made for the Government to provide all the land and equipment for a farmer and all his working capital, the net result being, of course, that he will be 100 percent in debt and will lack anything upon which to build credit for subsequent operations which, as the Senator from Minnesota has said, is an utterly untenable and ridiculous proposition. In my humble judgment, nothing sillier has ever been proposed.

I was about to say that it is not the first time such a thing has been proposed, for that is the precise basis upon which this crazy Alaskan adventure has been undertaken.

Last Friday the Senate passed a resolution asking Mr. Hopkins for certain information. I do not complain that the information is not as yet forthcoming, because there has scarcely been time for an adequate inquiry to produce the information. But I desire to call attention to some of the supplemental information which is available as a result of more recent publications in the newspapers.

For example, I refer to the Associated Press report of this morning under a Seattle date line, from which I read the opening sentence:

Alaska's Matanuska Valley was pictured as a "dusty, mosquito-infested country" instead of a promised land by 31 California transient workers after their return here from the Government's colonization project.

I drop down in the article to the following quotation:

All but three of the returning transients had asked to leave the Matanuska, a spokesman said. He added 178 more of the 400 temporary F. E. R. A. workers there had "begged to come back" but were told there was insufficient room on the homeward-bound ship.

"Three women colonists begged me to give them my identification tag", said William Peck, one of the returning men, "so that they could clip their hair, put on men's clothes, and get back to the States." They wanted to get back here and work to send their families enough money to break away, too.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire clipping may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my observations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORKERS CLAIM ALASKAN COLONY IS NO PARADISE—RETURNING TRANSIENTS HIT CONDITIONS AND CLIMATE

SEATTLE, June 23.—Alaska's Matanuska Valley was pictured today as a "dusty, mosquito-infested country" instead of a promised land by 31 California transient workers after their return here from the Government's colonization project.

Their chorus of dissatisfaction came on the heels of criticism from some 40 or 50 of the colonists themselves, whose charges of inefficiency were passed on to Washington and resulted in a Senate demand for a report on conditions.

Project Manager Don Irwin asserted that the disaffected colonists' charges were "greatly exaggerated."

Reports were circulated in Palmer, however, that Eugene Carr, a personal representative of Relief Administrator Harry L. Hopkins, had been appointed to "take charge" and was on his way there from Seattle.

It also was announced at Palmer that N. Lester Troast of the Indian Affairs Office, who had been assisting Irwin, had been recalled to Washington.

Work at the colony was at a Sabbath standstill today and the 1,000 colonists were saddened by the first death among their number, Donald Henry Koenen, 4, son of Henry Koenen, formerly of South Range, Wis., succumbed to measles and pneumonia and was buried yesterday.

All but three of the returning transients had asked to leave the Matanuska, a spokesman said. He added 178 more of the 400 temporary F. E. R. A. workers there had "begged to come back" but were told there was insufficient room on the homeward-bound ship.

"Three women colonists begged me to give them my identification tag", said William Peek, one of the returning men, "so that they could clip their hair, put on men's clothes, and get back to the States.

"They wanted to get back here and work to send their families enough money to break away, too."

Statements similar to the charges of the disaffected groups were made by several members of the returning contingent.

"They had carpenters helping in the kitchen, kitchen workers bossing logging gangs, and tractor men doing the carpenter work", said E. R. Skaggs, one of the 31.

"When we left", said Murl H. Montgomery, another returning transient, "there was only one cabin where they need 200. It's a crime for those families with tiny children to face the winter with prospects like that. I only wish I could testify before a Senate investigating committee."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I call attention to other newspaper information of the same character, indicating that if something is not done very promptly to restore these people to continental United States, or at least to civilization, there will be a major tragedy and a major calamity under the aegis of this amazing governmental experiment.

I have in my hand a copy, which I procured this morning, of the contract under which these unfortunate people have bound themselves in making this trip to the Alaskan experimental field, a field, by the way, which is many miles from a railroad, and to which no roads have been constructed.

Under the terms of this contract these poor people are provided with ample transportation facilities to reach Palmer, Alaska, but there is absolutely no way by which they can get back, and that of itself adds to the challenge of the moment, in view of the charge that this colony of 2,000 people is disease infested and contagion threatened.

I desire particularly to call attention, in passing, to two clauses of this contract under which these people have bound themselves to this Alaskan adventure. I read from the third paragraph in chapter 6 of the contract:

The colonist further agrees that he and the members of his family will abide by all Corporation administrative directions and supervision in connection with control of crop production, processing, marketing, distribution, crop rotation, soil management, sanitation, and other measures for the welfare of the community.

The other measures for the welfare of the community are defined in the first paragraph of this chapter, which I now quote:

The Corporation will build and equip such educational, cultural, recreational, health, work, and business centers in the community as the life of the community may require, and make the same available to the colonist and members of his family and other members of the community, and will furnish social and economic direction, supervisory and consultation services to the colonist, members of his family, and other members of the community on terms of mutual agreement and accord.

In other words, there is no one single element in the life and livelihood of the members of this community which is not contracted into the exclusive jurisdiction of the Corporation, namely, the Alaskan Rural Rehabilitation Corporation, which puts on this amazing experiment. So that we have in net essence a complete commune under the American flag at Palmer, Alaska. That is bad enough in its ethical contemplation; but when on top of that, in the face of a complete surrender of every possible individual function and every individual reliance, we find, as indicated in the special dispatch from Palmer, Alaska, to the Washington Star of June 20, 1935, that the responsible governmental Corporation has provided nothing in respect to the facilities which has been promised, and that these people are left stranded 5,000 miles from home in the face of threatening calamity, I submit that the information which the Senate has sought is not only highly important but it ought to be forthcoming with the least possible delay.

In connection with these observations I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD the article from the Washington Star to which I have referred and a copy of the contract.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matters referred to are as follows:

[From Washington Star of June 20, 1935]

DESERTION THREATENS AS WORK LAGS IN ALASKAN EXPERIMENT—TOOLS WHICH WERE TO HAVE BEEN READY FOR COLONISTS HAVE NOT ARRIVED, AND ONLY ONE HOUSE HAS BEEN STARTED

By Arville Schalefen

PALMER, ALASKA, June 20.—It is now confessed by officials that the magnitude of the task of settling 200 families in the Matanuska Valley was not realized when undertaken, and, recognizing the tremendous amount of work remaining to be done, authorities here are making desperate efforts to get more help.

Already the administrative personnel of the colonization division—as differentiated from the construction division, manned mainly by California transients—has been bolstered. Howard Lyng, of Nome, has been added as assistant to General Manager Don Irwin, and Ed Croning, of Anchorage, as purchasing and disbursing agent.

To date the transient laborers and some of the colonists have been in the valley more than a month and have not made a dent in work promised the settlers.

MUCH WORK TO BE DONE

Trouble ahead is revealed by a brief summary of the work to be done. The colony must:

Construct a community center, a monumental task in itself, considering available facilities.

Erect homes for all colonists (except for a few who happened to draw tracts with houses on them). Just one cottage is now started.

Erect shelters for livestock.

Provide a water supply for settlers' homes and livestock.

Clear 12 acres of land for each colonist.

Build thirty-odd miles of new roads in the valley, plus 12 miles connecting Palmer with the Anchorage road, now ending at Eklutna; and this includes a $150,000 bridge.

Prepare and harvest community garden and field crops for settlers and livestock during the winter.

Most of these tasks have not even been started and others just barely touched. For instance, the road program, under the Alaskan Highway Commission, is about a month behind. Director Irwin concedes that conditions are serious and other officials privately admit the situation is most alarming.

The colonists themselves the becoming apprehensive. Some of them talk about cutting loose and going into the woods and building their own shelters, even if they must give up their colony tracts to do it.

Others of the new settlers are sick and tired of delays, bickering, and mismanagement. Irwin says that four families have asked to be sent home, but rumors around the camps are that more than 30 are ready to quit. Those with serious complaints are asked to sign affidavits that conditions were misrepresented to them by case workers back home. Then the Alaska Rural Rehabilitation Corporation will investigate the charges and may provide transportation, according to Irwin. Nothing is definitely promised, however.

Transportation, more than any other colonization problem, was overlooked. In the first place, just two bands of steel, representing the Alaska Railroad, connect this wilderness with the rest of Alaska, there being no highway. It is a small system whose trains chase themselves around innumerable curves. The entire railroad has only some 70 cars and there are some 12,000 and more tons of freight coming into the colony.

RAILROAD SWAMPED

Approximately 4,000 tons have come into Palmer to date and it has kept the railroad practically swamped. Costly freight that never should be left uncovered has had to be dumped off and piled around Palmer to make cars available for more shipment. Bad weather could ruin thousands of dollars' worth of equipment.

Complicating the problem, materials have been shipped out of the United States that will not be needed for months.

"I've wired the shipping agent at Seattle time after time what we needed and had to have", Director Irwin declares. "I've told him ahead of time, so we'd have things here when needed."

What has happened? Two hundred kits of tools, such as hammers, axes, saws, levels, and planes for cutting house timber and erecting cottages should have been here when the colonists arrived. They are still missing. Authorities here bought up all available tools at Anchorage and Seward, and these, with what the colonists brought along, are all that there has been to work with. Sixty-nine horses arrived a month ago. They were to be hooked to wagons to haul timber out of the woods and supplement the overtaxed trucks on other haulage, but no wagons have come. The colonists finally borrowed six in the valley and that is all they could get.

But among the things which have arrived are eight carloads of cement which won't be used for months, retorts for a cannery whose site is not even staked out, radiators for a school house which still is just a blueprint, and onion graders for a prospective marketing cooperative, although onions are just beginning to shoot sprouts through the fertile soil.

Speaking of soil, it was most disheartening last week for 11 colonists to discover that, through error by surveyors, they had been allotted tracts which were mostly gravel covered only by moss, instead of the rich earth they so loudly lauded when they looked at it around Palmer. Irwin, who has stuck with the colonists through many annoying and unanticipated problems, immediately ordered new tracts for the unfortunate "gravel-pit owners", as they designated themselves.

Once again fisticuffs have been resorted to in the new colony, and this time the results were serious.

The latest difficulties involving personalities occurred in camp 6, one of eight temporary home camps scattered throughout the valley. The camp is split wide into two factions, so bitter toward each other that their members refuse to work with opposing members.

COLONISTS SETTLE DIFFERENCES

What to do about sawing logs caused the trouble. A group headed by Camp Councilman George Conners from Douglas County, Wis., wanted to go into the woods and cut down logs for their own houses and later get a sawmill. Other groups wanted to join camp 5 in operating a sawmill now there.

Conners was voted out as councilman because of his views and replaced by Ernest Porterfield, of Michigan. After the meeting the men stood around arguing until John Bradley, of Douglas County, told Al Covert, of Michigan, to "keep your mouth shut, so Conners can talk."

"You keep your mouth shut," Covert answered, "or I'll shut it for you!"

It happens that Covert and Bradley hold adjoining tracts, and Bradley said: "If we're going to have an argument, let's settle it now."

They grappled and fell (with Bradley on top). The Bradley faction stood at one side, yelling, "Let him have it, John! Let him have it!"

And someone on the other side answered, "Yeah, they're both 21; let them go."

WIFE GOES TO RESCUE

Mrs. Covert, in tears, jumped on Bradley as he held her husband down, but men in the crowd pulled her away. Bradley said he wouldn't hit a man while he was down, but he kept Covert pinned down so long that the Michigan man finally suggested, "Why don't someone serve cake and coffee?" And in a few minutes the two agreed to shake hands.

Since then, however, the Conners faction, badly outnumbered by the Porterfield faction, has refused to join in general colony sawmill operations, in which all men colonists are divided into work crews according to whatever they're fitted for, and declare they will build their own houses. They have asked for a team and wagon with which to get out logs.

"I don't care if we get only a shack," Bradley said. "I don't need a mansion this year, anyway. The only thing is that people back home think we are working in harmony, and I wish we could."

AROUSES LITTLE SYMPATHY

LANSING, MICH., June 20 (A. P.).—Complaints from Michigan farmers pioneering at Palmer, Alaska, aroused little sympathy at emergency welfare headquarters today.

Roswell G. Carr, director of rural rehabilitation, who directed the enrollment and transfer of the Michigan contingent, said its members "went into it with their eyes open."

Carr said complaints were to be expected, as the pioneers were entering a new land and facing unavoidable hardships. Those who complain because they are not given their food and clothing, he explained, were told before they started that they would be expected to buy them with Government loans.

Complaints about food prices, he said, were understandable, since prices in Alaska are high and farmers were moved there to produce the food, of which there is a scarcity.

ALASKA RURAL REHABILITATION CORPORATION—MATANUSKA VALLEY SETTLEMENT AGREEMENT

This agreement made this — day of ———, 1935, between the Alaska Rural Rehabilitation Corporation, whose principal office is at Juneau, Alaska, hereinafter known as the corporation, and ——— ——— of the county of ———, State of ———, whose post-office address is ———, hereinafter known as the colonist, in behalf of himself and family, consisting of the following members: ——— ———, witnesseth: That

Whereas the colonist and his family desire to settle on tillable land in the Matanuska Valley in the Territory of Alaska, in order to obtain subsistence and gainful employment from the soil and coordinated enterprises, establish a home, and enjoy the benefits of the rural community now being formed there; and

Whereas the corporation is a nonprofit corporation and has been organized and established to assist worthy and well-qualified individuals and families to accomplish the above-mentioned purposes and it desires to assist the colonist and the members of his family in doing so;

Therefore be it agreed, for and in consideration of the above premises and the mutual covenants herein contained, as follows:

1. TRANSPORTATION TO ALASKA

The corporation will assume the obligation to the transportation companies of the freight transportation of household and other effects up to 2,000 pounds of the colonist, and the above-mentioned members of his family from the point of departure to Palmer Station in the Matanuska Valley, and advance and pay for the purchase of, and include in said freight and its transportation, such needed household furniture, small tools, and home equipment as shall be agreed upon; same to be ultimately repaid by the colonist at the same low cost and special colonist rates as that charged the corporation. (The expense of travel of the colonist and the members of his family and the carriage of their baggage from the point of departure to destination in Alaska is to be attended to by the emergency relief administration of the home State at no cost to the colonist or members of his family and with no obligation of repayment.)

2. TEMPORARY CAMP

Upon arrival of the colonist and his family at Palmer Station the corporation will make available tents for their temporary shelter and habitation pending construction of their dwelling house and their moving on the land which they expect to make their permanent home.

3. LAND AND HOME IN THE RURAL COMMUNITY

The corporation will make available to the colonist for a farm and home for himself and his family not less than 40 acres of land on terms of payment running over a period of 30 years. (The corporation is in a position to make available to the colonists timbered land as low as $5 an acre and other land at prices in proportion thereto depending upon the location and the extent to which the land has been cleared.)

The Corporation will finance the colonist in building his dwelling house and other permanent improvements on the land. The colonist will repay for the same on an amortized plan over a period of 30 years.

4. FARM MACHINERY AND EQUIPMENT

The Corporation will furnish the colonist farm machinery, equipment, livestock, and other supplies and furnishings on such use-charge, lease, rental, or sale basis as may be agreed upon.

5. SUBSISTENCE

The Corporation will furnish subsistence to the colonist and the above members of his family at actual cost from their arrival at Palmer Station until such time as the products which the colonist and his family raise will enable him directly, or by exchange or sale, to furnish subsistence for himself and family.

6. COMMUNITY ACTIVITIES

The Corporation will build and equip such educational, cultural, recreational, health, work, and business centers in the community as the life of the community shall require, and make the same available to the colonist and members of his family and other members of the community, and will furnish social and economic direction, supervisory and consultation services to the colonist, members of his family and other members of the community on terms of mutual agreement and accord.

FULFILLMENT OF THIS AGREEMENT

The colonist agrees that the relationship established by this contract between him and the Corporation is to assist him and the members of his family to become established in a new home on a self-sustaining and self-supporting basis, and that he will repay all loans made to him by the Corporation in connection with the provisions under the above-numbered headings of this agreement or otherwise made to him by the Corporation, and pay for all material, supplies, equipment, furnishings, services, and personal, real, or mixed property referred to in the provisions under the above-numbered headings of this agreement or otherwise furnished him by the Corporation, which are rented, leased, or sold to him by or through the Corporation, upon such terms as are agreed upon, and will enter into and perform all obligations and contracts necessary in order to do so, it being understood that interest rates on all obligations shall not be greater than 3 percent per annum from the time they are incurred, and that payment of said interest shall not begin until the 1st day of September 1938, and that payment of installments of the principal on all said obligations shall not begin until the 1st day of September 1940, unless the colonist elects to make such payments at an earlier date.

The colonist further agrees that he and the members of his family will abide by all Corporation administrative directions and supervision in connection with control of crop production, processing, marketing, distribution, crop rotation, soil management, sanitation, and other measures for the welfare of the community, and to cooperate with the Corporation, its representatives, and with the other colonists in building up a successful rural community.

It is mutually agreed by the parties hereto that this agreement is subject to any Federal, State, or Territorial laws now existing or which may be hereafter enacted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2276) to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union.

PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES IN INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BARKLEY (for Mr. PITTMAN) submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2276) to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

KEY PITTMAN,
JOE T. ROBINSON,
WM. E. BORAH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
S. D. MCREYNOLDS,
SOL BLOOM,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

FARMERS' HOME CORPORATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2367) to create the Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy, to engage in rural rehabilitation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the provision now contained in the bill, is that the appointment of any person receiving a salary of $4,000 or more from the funds of the corporation, shall be subject to confirmation by the United States Senate. I think that is a very wise provision. It applies to civil-service employees and it applies to all those who are not civil-service employees. If it should apply to anybody it should apply to all alike, otherwise we would have a top-heavy organization. Under the Classification Act those connected with the civil service can be paid salaries up to $9,500, if I remember the act correctly. So this organization could be filled with any civil-service employees that any department of the Government wanted to get rid of.

I think if we are going to make the provision apply to anyone we ought to make it apply to all alike. There is nothing sacred about the civil service. Those under the civil service may be better prepared, it is true, but, if so, it makes their appointment just that much more easily confirmed, and if the Senate confirmation is good for ordinary nominees why should it not also be good for those in the civil service? There is no reason why it should not be. If we do not apply it to all alike, mark my word we are going to have this particular agency filled up with employees getting more money than those who manage and control it.

The only salary of $10,000 provided in the bill is to be paid to the appointive members of the board. Of course the other employees will be graduated in pay according to their positions, and it is provided that they shall be graduated accordingly. However, if we allow civil-service employees to be placed in this agency we will have it absolutely filled up with civil-service employees from other departments that want to get rid of them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I do not intend to dispute the statements which the Senator is making. What I am calling attention to is that this provision in the bill amounts to an amendment of the present civil-service law.

Mr. MCKELLAR. That law can be amended. Strange as it may seem, Congress has the right to amend that law. We are amending a number of laws in passing this bill, and there is no reason why we cannot amend the civil-service law if we so desire.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly not; but I desired to call attention to the fact that such would be the effect of the provision as it now stands. I think it advisable that that statement should appear in the RECORD.

I may say to the Senator that there is a further consideration. The efficient management of any body, of any bureau, of any commission, or of any department demands that the persons in charge shall be in complete charge. However, under the system which is proposed here, the corporation to be created will be loaded up with Presidential appointees who will not be subject to the control of their superiors, and I submit that such a condition cannot serve the ends of efficiency and will break down the efficient administration of the provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The President can appoint civil-service employees. There are no restrictions on the President. He has the right to send in the name of a civil-service employee for any place paying a salary of over $4,000.

I submit it would be unfair and unjust for this amendment to be adopted, and I hope it will not be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 20, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the figures "$4,000" and to insert in lieu thereof the figures "$6,000", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the appointment of any person receiving a salary of $6,000 or more per annum from the funds of the Corporation shall be subject to the confirmation of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say in this connection that the same statements I made in connection with the previous amendment apply with respect to this amendment. I wish particularly to call attention to the thought that the Senate should concern itself rather with the confirmation of persons nominated to hold key positions, and should not be concerned with the appointment of those who are to hold minor positions.

It is for that reason that I suggest changing the figure from $4,000 to $6,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, in my opinion, if we were engaged in the consideration of a bill to help an industrious and worthy man to acquire from 5 to 10 acres of land to assist him in the support of his family, we should have before us a proposal of merit. Last year 35,000,000 acres were withdrawn from productivity, for which the Federal Government paid the owners in excess of $400,000,000. The figures procured by me from the Agricultural Department last Saturday showed that the estimates of land withdrawals for this year are 30,000,000 acres, and, therefore, there will be paid five-sixths of the sum which was paid last year. Six hundred thousand farmers in the United States are in distress, and the Agricultural Department estimates that the number will be increased to 800,000 during the present summer.

In analyzing the pending bill, which provides for a capitalization of $50,000,000, which may be increased, and also for a bond issue of $1,000,000,000, it is easy to figure that all the applications may come from one State or from a portion of one State. There is no provision for equal distribution among the 48 States. There is no limitation as to the amount which may be advanced to the buyer of a farm. A farm in the great Northwest may cost $30,000, and a farm in New England may cost from $3,000 to $5,000. There are some inequalities in the bill.

Mr. President, the figures I procured at the Department of Agriculture on Saturday last amongst other things show that $2,609,881,538 represents the amount of mortgages under Federal farm mortgage loans outstanding on February 28, 1935.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONERGAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say that in the Judiciary Committee this morning statements were made that in some States farm mortgages were being foreclosed, so it is obvious that farmers will need hundreds of millions of dollars to meet their obligations and to save their farms from foreclosure. Would it not be better to try to protect the farmers who are trying to protect their homes and to raise sufficient food for the United States than to embark upon this unsound adventure, which, judging from all the facts available, is certain to end in disaster?

Mr. LONERGAN. It would, Mr. President, but what I do not understand is that the Federal Government paid $400,000,000 to induce farmers not to plant crops, and now we are setting up machinery with a capital of $50,000,000, which may be increased, and a bond issue of a billion dollars, for the purpose of enabling them to buy farms. On the one side, we tell them not to raise certain crops and pay them not to do it. On the other side, we are offering to aid people to buy farms. The bill contains inconsistencies; there is no demand for it and it should be defeated.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table headed "Appendix C—Rental and Benefit Payments Actually Disbursed", which appears on pages 350 and 351 of the publication Agricultural Adjustment in 1934, being a report of the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, February 15, 1934, to December 31, 1934, issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I propose an amendment on page 20, line 11, after the word "Corporation", the last three syllables of the word being on line 11, to insert:

Nor compensation in excess of that received by employees of the Government in like or similar services.

May I say, Mr. President, that to my knowledge a similar amendment has been offered in a number of bills. It merely provides that employees in this organization shall not receive greater compensation than that which is paid in like employment in various activities and establishments of the Government.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, when this bill was previously before the Senate I made some observations with reference thereto, and I do not now see that the bill has been improved in any way by the substitution of the committee amendment. I call attention to the fact that on page 16, paragraph 3, there is found the following provision:

(c) The Corporation shall have capital stock in the amount of $50,000,000, and the board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to increase such capital stock from time to time in such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Corporation.

I do not believe that Congress ought ever to permit a delegation of power to the President which involves the right of the President to increase the capital stock of a corporation in any amount he may see fit in order to carry out the policies of the corporation. It seems to me that, and that alone, ought to be enough to defeat the bill.

Second, on page 17, line 22, I find the following language:

Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds, the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States of any officer or officers thereof.

In other words, there is a direct guaranty on the part of every taxpayer in this country to put Uncle Sam into the real-estate promotion business in whatever section of the country the corporation to be created may see fit to invest in land, and to guarantee, if you please, the entire expenditure as to both interest and principal. I do not believe that there is any authority in the Constitution for Uncle Sam to go into the real-estate promotion business. I do not think such authority may be found under any section of the Constitution. On the other hand, it is my belief that this is just another case where we are trying to read into the Constitution something that is not there. In other words, the result will be the same as in the "chicken" case, and the Supreme Court of the United States will finally determine that such a law is not authorized under the Constitution and may not be enacted.

Reference has already been made to the exemption carried in the bill, and it has been admitted on the floor that if the exemption be granted which is authorized under the bill on page 26, section 5, there will not only be the homestead exemption, which is now permissible in every State in the Union, but there will also be another exemption which will be for the amount of the $2,500 as specified in the bill. Therefore, there may be two men, one living on one side of the road on a farm purchased from the Federal Government and another man living on the other side of the road on a piece of land privately purchased with his own money, one of whom will have a special exemption from debt and, therefore, he may go into debt in excess and say to his creditors, after they have given him credit on the theory that he was the owner of land, "You just cannot do anything about it, because my land is exempt under the law passed by Congress." That would be a discrimination in favor of one citizen as against another citizen.

Mr. AUSTIN. And in favor of the one who would not deserve it.

Mr. DICKINSON. It would be a discrimination in favor of one who would not really deserve a favor.

Secondly, I want to say that socialization programs of this kind never have worked. I think we have had some experience in reclamation which has shown us that the Government is not always able, through its type of leadership, to determine what is or is not cultivable land; to determine when land may be properly irrigated in order to produce crops.

We also find that practically every socialization program of this kind which has ever been attempted has proven to be a failure.

When this bill was previously before the Senate I read, to some extent, from the final report filed June 30, 1931, by the division of land settlement, department of agriculture, State of California. Two projects had been set up, one known as the "Durham land settlement" and the other known as the "Delhi land settlement." I find that these settlements were not a success; they never were a success; and on page 20 of the report, to which I have heretofore referred, I find this is the conclusion of the State of California:

It cannot be gainsaid that there was a serious land colonization problem facing the State at the time the State land settlements were started, and that there is still a definite service to be performed by the State government along colonization lines, but that service apparently can best be carried out through rigid State regulation of those private agencies seeking to colonize the lands of the State for profit, as the demand for settlement develops and conditions affecting agricultural activity warrant.

In other words, there is a direct finding on the part of the State commission that a land settlement of that kind could not be made a success under State supervision. I also find in a final report, reading from the last paragraph, the following:

As to the deeds of trust which have been extinguished at both settlements where the amount was $152,862.98, we have received the sum of $101,063.69, which represents a loss of $51,799.29, or a loss of 33.89 percent.

Respectfully submitted.

ARLIN E. STOCKBURGER,
Director of Finance.

JANUARY 26, 1935.

In order to understand just what is proposed in this bill I think it is well to read the statements of some of those who would naturally be interested in this type of program. I find that M. L. C. Gray, Chief of the Division of Land Economics in the Department of Agriculture, made this statement:

It is proposed that the credit facilities of the Government be made available to farm owners for adjusting the size of farm tracts in certain areas and for promotion of farm ownership in areas where tenancy is prevalent. One proposal is that the Government acquire the present extensive areas of farm lands held by banks and insurance companies and by other classes of landowners who are not interested directly in operating their land and extend long-term credit to tenant operators for the buying of farms of profitable size.

No one objects to that. But, on the other hand, let me suggest that the trouble with most of the tenants in the United States and most of the men who have found themselves in distress on account of land ownership and debts against their land has been due to the fact that they were able to borrow too much money against their land and not too little. It was not the question of being able to secure finances; it was a question of getting so much credit that the borrowers were not able to pay the interest and taxes on their investment. Therefore when economic conditions changed and the depression began and prices declined, when the revenues from a farm decreased from 50 to 60 percent, as they did in many other lines of endeavor, we found that farmers were not able to carry through.

Commenting on this, Harvey Ingham, in the Des Moines Register of Saturday morning, June 22, 1935, states:

One thing is plain to those who have known the farm situation from the early days, and that is that the Government must stabilize the values of lands and keep them stabilized if a lot of landowners of one year are not to become the tenants the next. The shift in the Middle West in this last period of deflation has been terrific, and not at all at the instance of the banks, insurance companies, and private citizens who have been forced to take over the lands. So long as land is like other property open to purchase and sale for a profit there will be a steady shifting of ownership. It is this, unquestionably, that explains the demand for Government regimentation.

In other words, so long as there is a shifting in values anywhere along the line, it is going to affect land just as it affects every other investment. We have seen stocks go up and down; we know that they do go up and down according to the demand for the commodity manufactured by the particular concern whose stock is affected. So we find in this respect that stocks are just like land. The farmer in the Middle West now is not suffering from lack of credit; he is suffering from too much credit. I used to think a banker was a good friend of mine when he would lend me a little money. I found, after about 3 years of the depression, that he was the worst enemy I ever had. If he had not loaned me the money I would not have been in distress as a debtor, as I proved to be. That is the reason why we find a great many people talking about the present lack of credit.

A while ago I called attention to a Federal Housing Corporation letter. That agency is handing out invitations to the landowner, to the home owner, "Come in and borrow money; put a new bathroom in your house; reshingle it; put new linoleum in your kitchen; put in a new bedroom; add a new porch; put a mortgage on your home." Under the old philosophy we always found that a mortgage was the first step to dispossession of a man's home. Therefore, there should be no mortgage permissible on a home at the invitation and suggestion of the Government.

I think it was Mr. Rubin, after his return from Europe, in relation to the socialization of the affairs of the world, who made this statement:

I would rather live in a country where there is an unequal enjoyment of credit than in a country where there is an absolutely impartial distribution of money. One extreme always yields to the other.

Do Senators appreciate the philosophy?

I would rather live in a country where there is an unequal enjoyment of credit—

Suppose the other fellow does have a little more than you have. Perhaps it is a good thing that he has, but you ought not to be jealous because he may have a little more than you have. Therefore—

I would rather live in a country where there is an unequal enjoyment of credit than in a country where there is absolutely impartial distribution of money.

I think there is a great deal of philosophy in that statement.

Mr. President, in order to present the matter and show what I believe is the socialistic trend in a great deal of the legislation we are now proposing, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a statement made by myself before the Amen Corner Club at Pittsburgh, Pa., with reference to socialistic trends.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Although the Democratic platform was accepted by the Presidential nominee in 1932 without equivocation or reserve, none of the fundamentals endorsed in that platform are being followed at this date.

That platform declared for a drastic reduction in Government expenditure; the abolishment of useless commissions and offices; the consolidation of departments and bureaus; and the elimination of extravagance. None of these promises have been fulfilled.

Let us go back several years and check the activities and proposals of those of the Socialist faith.

In 1921 the Socialist Party, as such, concluded that it might get further by joining a movement with other discordant groups, and adopted a resolution calling for a conference of all such groups to develop a plan of united political action. This conference, known as the "national conference for progressive political action", was held in Cleveland in December of 1922.

In 1924 the conference for progressive political action met in Cleveland and nominated Senator Robert M. La Follette as their candidate for President.

It is interesting to note that the keynote speech by the national chairman of the conference was headlined as: "New deal is text of keynote." In a congratulatory message to Senator La Follette after his nomination, signed by A. A. Berle, Jr., Frederic C. Howe, and others, there was this statement: "We believe that the time has come for a new deal * * *."

Some of the resolutions adopted by this convention of the conference for progressive political action were as follows:

"Public ownership of * * * water power and creation of a public superpower system."

"Strict public control and permanent conservation of all natural resources * * *."

"Promotion of public works in times of business depression."

"Reconstruction of the Federal Reserve and Federal Farm Loan Systems to provide for direct public control of the Nation's money and credit * * *."

"We favor submitting * * * a constitutional amendment providing that Congress may by enacting a statute make it effective over a judicial veto."

Who was the chairman of the resolutions committee that reported these resolutions to that Socialist meeting in 1924? It was none other than Mr. Donald R. Richberg, now "assistant President of the United States."

Other prominent members of the present new deal who played important parts in the program and campaign of the conference for progressive political action are: Mr. Basil Manly, now a member of the Federal Power Commission; Sidney Hillman, a member of the Consumers' Advisory Board in the N. R. A.; Frederic C. Howe, consumer's counsel of the A. A. A.; J. A. Franklin and Rose Schneiderman, both members of the Labor Advisory Board in the N. R. A.; A. A. Berle, Jr., one of the original members of the "brain trust", and Rexford G. Tugwell, now Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

These Democratic officeholders of today were actively engaged in defeating the Democratic Party in 1924, which was led by John W. Davis and C. W. Bryan.

The views of those connected with the Socialist faith have not changed since 1924. This is shown by the national platform of the Socialist Party in 1932. In reading that platform, I find the following:

"We favor an immediate appropriation of $5,000,000,000 for relief to supplement State and local expenditures and the appropriation of an equal amount for public works, including roads, reforestation, slum clearance, and housing."

I read further and find declarations for "the creation of national, regional, and State boards to determine the best utilization of rural land; Government ownership of the liquor business; abolition of the power of the Supreme Court to pass on the constitutionality of legislation enacted by Congress; complete acquisition of the Federal Reserve Banks by the Government; the operation of the power industry by administration board; the recognition of Soviet Russia."

In all candor, I ask you to compare the program of the present administration with the program above suggested.

Consistent Democrats should be willing to admit that outside influences have taken control of their party. By working from within, this former third party group now dominates the Democratic Party. The party platform of 1932 has been abandoned, although definitely accepted by Roosevelt as the Presidential nominee. The Socialist platform of 1924 has been substituted therefor.

The leadership of the Democratic Party, so far as policy is concerned, is now in the hands of those who were in key positions of the progressive, Socialist Party of 1924.

This is why many of our Democratic leaders are supporting the new deal with lip service only. This is why they give the administration program support with their tongue in their cheek.

This change of program has never been ratified by the sound-thinking Democrats of the South. State-rights Democrats have no place in the present-day program of centralized Federal control and bureaucratic domination.

The Democratic Party of Roosevelt and Farley is not the Democratic Party of Jefferson, or Cleveland, or Wilson, or Al Smith. Through the influence of the Socialist group now holding positions in the present administration, Roosevelt has directed the program of the Democratic Party towards socialistic reform.

Verily, Miss Democracy, through the direction of Roosevelt and under the management of Farley, is being taken for a ride.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON. Very well; I shall take my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I find in the Annals of the American Academy for March 1935, a statement from Donald Richberg on Constitutional Aspects of the New Deal, from which I quote as follows:

This school of thought argues that the Government must organize and direct the essential industries of a nation for public service, and that for the incentive of private profit we must substitute the obligation of service to the general welfare.

Further quoting:

We could not establish a political determination of what goods shall be produced, what prices shall be charged, and what wages shall be paid, and at the same time maintain those individual rights of property and individual liberties of conduct which are guaranteed in the Constitution. We could not administer the infinite details of regimenting the lives of millions of citizens and preserve a judicial review of the justice of each separate restraint upon the freedom of the individual. In a word, we could not achieve such a planned economy as is embodied in any program of State socialism without a political revolution and the definite abandonment of our constitutional safeguards of individual freedom.

I quote further:

In various activities of the Federal Government, particularly in the N. R. A. and the A. A. A., we have been seeking to carry forward our constitutional principles of self-government into a political-economic order which will serve the needs of the twentieth century and which can be established under our fundamental law and in harmony with the traditions and purposes of American life.

It has been found that the views expressed by Mr. Richberg are not at this time in accord with the rights under the Constitution and, therefore, I take it that as a prophet of planned economy to eliminate individual initiative Mr. Richberg is no longer going to consider himself an authority. In other words, his reputation seems to have passed with the decision of the Supreme Court in the "chicken" case that the N. R. A. was absolutely unconstitutional.

I also find further that most of these experiments have not resulted in a wholesome development in any line of endeavor. From Mr. David Lawrence's article of a few evenings ago I quote:

The latest of these is the passing of the dream of the "planned economy" experts on the subject of "rural resettlement" and "subsistence homesteads."

It will be recalled that populations were to be moved about, small communities were to be built, and, in short, America was to be remade by the new deal.

I take it many Members of the Senate have learned the truth about what is known as "Red House", a rural section nearby. In a picture in the February number of the Nation's Business we see a large number of houses being built in that locality. I understand that now practically none of those houses are occupied, that the loans cannot be paid, that the amount suggested to be paid is excessive, and the opportunities to make money in that locality do not permit men to carry the overhead expenses of either maintaining or owning a home of such magnitude in that vicinity. In other words, instead of thinking about how much money could be made in that locality, they went ahead and built a large number of houses, and then found there was no one to live in them and there was not enough money to be made in the vicinity to support any of the homes, or, at least, more than a very limited number of them.

I quote further from Mr. Lawrence:

But now, alas, the whole thing is being liquidated as impractical, or to put it more gracefully, the idea is being recast with plans much more modest.

In two years with $25,000,000 to spend only 33 projects were started, involving 1,065 houses either completed or under construction. At present only about 268 of these houses are occupied.

The troubles are manifold. In the first place, sticking a rural settlement in the middle of a vast area and trying to make a community where there is no employment for the inhabitants has been found to be an obstacle. Take Reedsville, W. Va., in which Mrs. Roosevelt had a special interest. Well, they are still trying to persuade a certain captain of industry to have his company put a factory or branch or something there so as to give the town a start.

But town building on the whole has proved a flop. The rumor is that even the left wing Dr. Tugwell does not like the sociological aspects of these communities. They turn into "company towns" if dominated by one industry or they become centers of intensive or excessive reform, with more conservation than work.

* * * * * * *

So the projects turned out to be interesting only to stranded miners or destitute farmers or run-down city persons who were willing to try anything once. Also, the record of repayment to the Government on the loans made for the subsistence homes has been poor, and other discouraging aspects have entered into the picture.

In other words, the people who could occupy those homes were not able to buy the homes, were not able to pay the overhead expenses of the homes, were not able to do the things required of them to be done in order to comply with the requirements of the Government. The only thing the Government could possibly have done was to permit them to occupy the homes without having to pay anything.

I quote further from David Lawrence:

The first news of what happened came officially with a brief bulletin posted on the Department of Agriculture's board recently stating that the Subsistence Homestead Division had to be liquidated this month. This was based, of course, on the expiration of the provisions of the old National Industrial Recovery Act. But then there was in the offing the $4,000,000,000 work-relief program. Dr. Tugwell had been made Rural Resettlement Administrator.

The President too bad earmarked $100,000,000 for the Resettlement Division. But the mathematical bugaboo which limited to only about $1,140 the amount to be spent on each man employed has put a damper on the whole resettlement plan. At a recent meeting of key executives in the administration, the President looked ruefully at Undersecretary Tugwell as he remarked that some of Rex's pet projects would have to go by the boards.

Dr. Tugwell is represented as believing that the best method would be to set up projects of suburban homes or what are called "satellite cities." These would be homes built on an acre of ground and sold to city workers on the edge of a town or city. Experience with this type of project at Houston, Tex., has convinced Dr. Tugwell that it would be useful.

That simply shows the impractical phase of many of the projects which are now being advocated.

It is my belief that there is a great deal of "boring from within." I have shown the socialistic trend of various types of legislation proposed here. The Government is being gradually woven into various socialistic schemes. Now, I am going to refer to one further thing, and that is the suggestion that a man in a position where he receives confidential information may be able to carry on without the Government knowing very much about what his motives are, and in that way he may secure information which will afterward permit him to further a plan of his own.

Only today, as I understand, the report of the Munitions Committee has been filed. It contains a great deal of testimony from Mr. H. S. Raushenbush. I find in an article by Mr. Raushenbush, which is printed in the Socialism of Our Times, such statements as that—

The students coming from the colleges today can do something more than be filled with wholesome and cleansing indignation. They can be of enormous use to the movement as Government officials, starting in small and definitely working on the reasonable hope that in the course of another 10 years we shall have Government control of a much more definite kind over our trusts, banks, and general industries—

And so forth. He also says that—

One good man, with his eyes, ears, and wits about him, inside the Department—whether it be the Interior, where the oil scandal started and the Boulder Dam bill received most active support, or the Treasury, where the taxation scandals breed and the Government tax policies originate—can do more to perfect the technique of control over industry than a hundred men outside.

Mr. President, I have every sympathy with the good work that the Munitions Committee has been doing, but in reading the report I believe we should have the background of this man. Therefore, I ask that this article of his be printed in RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SOME MEASURES IN TRANSITION

By H. S. Raushenbush

There is reason for optimism at present in considering the transitional state. We can see more clearly the function which liberals and socialists—both those who are essentially scholars and students and those who are politicians—can have in changing the social order.

The very subject "transitional state" implies that we have accepted the alternative of encroaching control in place of the dream of cataclysmic socialism which has engrossed people dissatisfied with the world for so many years. There is an acceptance here of our own realities. The drama of conflict—the last of the great St. Petersburgs of the world—does not represent the world we live in. It is not pleasant to give up that dream of a violent triumph. We are sensitive about it. We hear the charge of cowardliness, of the unheroic quality of compromise. Let us face that and have it done. It is a conflict and extends into all phases of life. In literature people who wish to escape from the world are romanticists. Those who have the same desire but more sense of truth and actuality becomes our realists, bitter that the world is so little like what they want it to be.

To refuse to face the fact that we live in a dynamic world rather than in the Hegelian world of Marx is cowardly. And if we are aware that there is no longer any prophetic destiny in Marx and still (for want of a better cause and because we like or are unable to detach ourselves from the dreams of our youth) preach revolution and get other men to spend their efforts toward the fulfillment of a prophecy that is not divinely inspired, that is a cowardly compromise. It is playing fast and loose with the rank and file who starve and strike upon the leaders' say-so. Every union compromises when it signs an agreement with the employer. And the Communist unions do it as much as the A. F. of L. unions. We live in a world that can be changed slowly, but it can be changed by people who are willing enough to identify themselves with the small common desires of the people of the country, who are willing to work in realistic ways toward power.

POWER VERSUS SPIRITUAL VALUES

Here I wish to note a dissension from Henri de Man. He claims that the real foe is the capitalist spirit, that the spirit of service and the pride in things well done would have to be substituted as leading motives of social activity for the desires for wealth and power—that freedom, self-determination, and dignity were to be the rallying cries. Here he goes mystic to some extent. These spiritual values move people somewhat. There will always be audiences who applaud appeals to the dignity of man, the pleasure of voting to determine one's lot. But men vote today mainly for their own economic interests and for some sense of power. The bandwagon has human springs. To throw over economic interest and power for more spiritual values seems a bad and forced second choice. According to Stolberg, Christ did exactly that. In the first stages He was a revolutionary patriot—wanted power. When He saw that He could not have that, He said, "Well, then, at least I will possess My own soul—blessed are the meek." He saw that power, such as all human, full-blooded people want, could not be had without compromise, except at one point—death. The revolutionists today are the true Christians. The rest of us are the people who stay alive. And the majority of the people in this country are going to stay alive and think in simple demands of "more" and "more."

To the very extent that we are liberals or Socialists, we have already differentiated ourselves from the mass of the workers and shopkeepers and academically trained people of today. They want such small favors as the political machines can give them—jobs, protection, financial help in time of stress. They are uninterested in schemes or theories of government. They have not the free space to think far ahead. They also have some terrible need to be thought well of by their neighbors, some fear of losing their jobs, that keeps them out of the radical camp. When we say, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free", we perform a remarkable act of faith in intellect. It is power that will make people free. We can be a hundred times right and be authors of brilliant books telling how rotten the world is, and have less influence during our whole lives on the welfare of the people of the country than a lieutenant in a Tammany precinct.

Some of us are introverted and turn away from the bustle of politics to our books and dialectic discussions with so much relief that our political efficacy will probably always be amateurish and slight. Others of us have the capacity to be politicians, and in them our hope for the speeding up of the transitional state rests now.

AMERICA PRAGMATIC

The carrying drive of any movement or organization in this country today is simply pragmatic. This side of revolution (Russia, Italy, Germany) we can only take what opportunities we can make ourselves or are suffered for illustrations in socialist practice, to convince both the workers and the middle class that we are right, that the abolition of the profit system is to their interest and will result in higher real wages, greater security, freedom from wars, and other forms of autocracy. Unless we can show workers results from day to day, they will turn to someone who can, or who can promise to. Meanwhile the local machines give them small favors and protection. The Socialist candidate for president gives them only the glory of shaking his hand. Marx has convinced his thousands, but the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission has convinced its hundreds of thousands. We need more leverage places like the latter. And there are parts of our political life today where we have such a wedge.

The students coming from the colleges today can do something more than be filled with wholesome and cleansing indignation. They can be of enormous use to the movement as Government officials, starting in small and definitely working on the reasonable hope that in the course of another 10 years we shall have Government control of a much more definite kind over our trusts, banks, and general industries; that there will be Government corporations operating and managing, not only the port of New York and Muscle Shoals, but many other developments. There is a chance here for young men, not only to keep the liberal groups informed about the dirty work going on and times and ways to prevent it, but also to look forward to careers of usefulness in executive positions, making the Government control over industry more adequate, pioneering in a field of essential importance.

Government officials in the bureaus and departments at Washington, Albany, Trenton, Harrisburg, and other State capitals are of great importance. The wages are not high. That is one reason why so many of them go over to private industries and favor private industries before they do go over to them—earn their jobs ahead of time. Yet the problem of Government officials is a major problem of immediate socialism. In Germany, after the revolution, the bureaucracy was nationalist and nearly sabotaged the republican government, until it had been replaced. One good man with his eyes, ears, and wits about him, inside the Department—whether it be the Interior, where the oil scandal started and the Boulder Dam bill received most active support, or the Treasury, where the taxation scandals breed and the Government tax policies originate—can do more to perfect the technique of control over industry than a hundred men outside. His reward will be more immediate than if he becomes a teacher. If he finally decides to leave the Government for labor, he will bring something more than a general willingness. He will bring a background.

THE NEED IN POLITICS

With the weakness of the unions today in the industrial field, Congress and the Legislature have become more important. Senator Smoot knows everything that moves anywhere in Washington and so is invaluable to his side. We need a group of men who will do and be the same for the opposition.

Now this is power politics—just as the proposal that we give our help, support, and honors to the men who are politicians enough to know and help the people in their own districts well enough to be elected by them, is power politics. I admit its dangers in the transitional state of affairs. The men who want success only will go Tammany or to the Thompson machine, unable to wait—or become merely cheap politicians.

The very idea of saying to people that you want government ownership of railroads or electric power, not because it is eternally right, but because it is cheaper for the workers and can be so proved, will be hailed by some as a compromise or betrayal of socialism. But as I understand it, Lenin himself summed up each situation by itself and met it as he could, practically and pragmatically, and after that was done sat down to write these long, dry theses of rationalization proving that Engels and Marx would have agreed.

The Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Union compromises with its employers, holds so little (on the face of it) by the doctrine of inveterate struggle between the two classes, that it finances some of the employers when their bankruptcy would throw union members out of work. Still we know that there are some things the Amalgamated will not compromise on.

The spiritual leaders of the liberal and radical movement will see to it that the new power is used for the purposes we have always desired, that the ideals are not forgotten.

I admit that the process is full of pitfalls. So is the whole progress of the transitional state. Properly engineered, a period of high prices, low wages, and unemployment may set us back a long time. Fear of too rapid transition dropped the franc another cent in 1926 and overthrew even a liberal ministry in France. Herriot thought it so important that the radical group should regain the confidence of the country and have a part in stabilizing the franc that he joined the Poincare Cabinet and spent a large part of his last campaign (1928) claiming that he had not been responsible for the drop originally and had nobly helped restore the franc to 4 cents. This was an important thing to the workers of the country, and a nasty position for any honest man to be in, but important because indicative not only of how many tricks the controlling powers have in the bag to make the transitional state difficult, but of the danger of compromising at the wrong time. Still, the business of having leaders at all involves this danger.

There has been more said about the development of a political party that will have some power to effect a transitional state, than about the relative places of industrial, parliamentary, cooperative, and educational action in such a state. It is likely that within 10 years the dominant unions of the country will have exhausted the possibility of their present policy of being respectable at any price. Virtue can be its own streetwalker for only so long. By that time we may expect new leaders and a different drive behind them.

EFFECTIVE TRUST CONTROL

In the field of governmental control of industry, however, possibilities are more definite.

Trust control: There is a considerable movement on now to repeal the Clayton Act in the coal industry, to allow trustification. Once that barrier has been let down we may expect trustification to be allowed in other industries. This process is as important as anything on the American scene today. In return for giving up our beloved system of competition for monopoly, it is not impossible to exact a price; to get some share of control which can then be extended as the need for it becomes evident. In Germany the Government sits in on every trust and in some cases Government-owned corporations are parts of the trust. The antitrust act and the Federal Trade Commission Act were cease and desist acts—the policeman with the club stopping traffic. Actually, our regulation to replace the supposedly automatic safeguards of competition is more complicated and potential. Regulation by public-service commissions, North Dakota's governmental competition in grain elevating, banking, and insurance, and the Federal Government's participation in formulation of banking policy are cases in point.

Very moderate control, under the press of social need, can develop rapidly. The Interstate Commerce Commission started with the duty of eliminating rebates and now has some measure of supervision over the activities of the railroads, their combination, and the distribution of their group earnings. If the courts allow the railroads to add another $11,000,000,000 to the present valuation, we may expect enough indignation from shippers and public generally to lead to further control.

In the Federal Reserve Bank Act we brought under national jurisdiction the banking organizations in which we previously had no say at all. All national banks were required to join this system. A situation was created where many State banks found it advisable to join. On each Federal Reserve bank we have three directors appointed by the Federal Reserve Board representing the banking policy of the Government. The Board has considerable power, not only in appointment and supervision, but in control of the rediscount rate. In its open-market operations it can exercise some influence over the business cycle. There is nothing in a long line of judicial decisions which prevents a control analagous to that which is exercised by the Federal Government over banks from being applied by a State legislature to any industry which is held to be affected with the public interest * * *.

The Court has even held it easier for a State government to go into business itself than to regulate business. North Dakota's attempts to go into all sorts of businesses were attacked, but upheld. Meanwhile the regulatory attempts involved in the Kansas Industrial Court Act were not upheld.

Once an industry is declared affected with the public interest it is reasonable to have the books opened, then to go on with the clamping down on excess profits, stock dividends, inflated mergers, and to have a positive hand in stabilization of employment, uniform working conditions, minimum wage, supervision of all mergers, establishment of the principle of recapturing excess earnings as in the railroads, to go into a retirement fund through which the State can finally buy out the industry on an annuity plan.

In the electric power industry we have four things to go on:

(1) The desire of the people to keep their natural resources.

(2) The weakness of regulation as to a protection to the people.

(3) The evidence of what unscrupulous influence the industry has been exerting in our schools, press, and political life.

(4) The fact that the State not only has the power to cancel charters, but that the companies must constantly come to it for new grants of privilege, power to condemn land and riparian rights, to merge, etc.

We have made three attempts at control. We have set up municipal plants. Their status is changing, and we should face that fact. Outside of the large cities they can rarely compete in rates and efficiency with the new plants being established by private companies having the benefit of the connected load of wide interconnections. We have tried regulation by State commissions. It has gotten out of hand. A third attempt to control the water power was in the Federal Water Power Act of 1920. Here we have set down the principle that rates shall not exceed a return on the net cost of the money actually invested, that excess earnings shall be recaptured, and that the project may be bought at the end of 50 years by the Government at the net cost.

The fourth attempt is that of having Government corporations, like the Port Authority of New York, operating the power at Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, and on the St. Lawrence. With these developments furnishing cheap power, these great sections of the country will realize the advantages of public as opposed to private ownership. We cannot hope to take over the whole $8,000,000,000 industry successfully, even if it were generally thought advisable to do so at the moment. There would be danger of sabotage. But by putting in a preference that power from these developments shall be furnished by State and municipal plants, we can move toward a system of linked-up plants such as the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission.

While the long-time aim of the liberal and radical groups is the abolition of the profit system for private use, our present strategy should be to make and take every opportunity to prove that there is something better than the profit system. Within the next 10 years we are going to have a chance such as we have not had for the last 40.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, this being the case, I am convinced that this bill is just another step in a direction which I think is most dangerous, and I do not believe it will be wholesome. I do not believe we can cure tenancy by any such step. Therefore, it is my hope that the bill will be again recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, knowing something of the recent policies of the Agriculture Department, I was not surprised at the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] when he referred to the enormous amount of money taken from the Treasury of the United States, or from alleged processing taxes, and paid to persons in the United States for withdrawing land from cultivation.

As I have heretofore indicated, no little evidence has been brought to my attention that some of the land alleged to have been withdrawn from cultivation had not been cultivated or would not have been cultivated. Nevertheless, during the past year a stupendous sum, more than $400,000,000, has been paid to persons for failure to farm lands which they probably would not have farmed and some lands which they would have farmed.

Moreover, as I indicated sometime ago in speaking to one of the amendments, large sums have been paid for bounties and subsidies in connection with agricultural crops and agricultural developments.

The scheme before us—and, in my judgment, it is a very unsound one—will result in failures such as have not been infrequent during the past 100 years in the United States and in other countries. I think the facts warrant many of the statements made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] this afternoon.

We are promising to purchase farms for persons who have been driven from the farm by unwise policies, and promising to loan to them considerable sums, involving them in debt which they cannot pay; and paralleling this scheme we found thousands of farmers who now are voluntarily withdrawing their lands from cultivation, and thousands of others who are unable to meet their obligations, and are being forced into the courts under foreclosure proceedings, or feel compelled to avail themselves of the bankruptcy law.

Mr. President, I am in receipt of an article appearing in The State, a Democratic newspaper of South Carolina, which, while I do not agree with some of the statements contained therein, reveals somewhat the views of some people of the United States. It is entitled:

EATING AT DAD'S TABLE IS A PRIVILEGE PAID FOR BY OBEYING DAD'S WILL

Esau was not the last to trade his birthright for a mess of pottage. Americans are slowly but surely doing it now.

Observe a group of threescore jobless transients standing in front of a mission. A youth appears and barks at them: "All right, men; fall in line. This way." They follow him single file, block after block, to their destination, and there stand in line, silent, listless, to get a shower bath, a bowl of soup, and a bunk.

Observe another line of men, rich planters, poor whites, and colored tenants, patiently waiting their turn to get gin tickets, which are Government permits to have their crop prepared for market.

Farmers in other regions are planting the number of acres they are told to plant.

Manufacturers, until the Supreme Court interfered, were employing the men they were told to employ, keeping the hours they were told to keep, charging the price they were told to charge.

And everywhere in the land, unfortunately, people are answering questions and revealing the details of their misery to establish their right to the Government's charity.

Never before in the history of our race have so many free men swallowed their pride, surrendered their independence, and accepted official direction of their private affairs.

The intent of all this is good and in many instances the result achieved is beneficial. But is that enough?

Beyond doubt, the business of the Nation would be managed more efficiently and the people as a whole would be more prosperous and more secure if one central authority controlled all industry and business as a general controls an army.

But prosperity and security are not the things men value most. Again and again they have been sacrificed to gain liberty.

Caged animals are better fed and better housed than free ones, but they are not better satisfied.

There are still millions of high-spirited Americans who would rather eat crusts in freedom than to gain security and wealth by meekly obeying the impudent underlings of a paternal bureaucracy.

And these must be eternally vigilant and clamorously vocal if they would preserve their heritage and birthright.

Mr. President, undoubtedly there is a strong movement to socialize the industries of our country, and to superimpose upon industry and upon individuals a regimentation which is hateful to men who love liberty and freedom. This bill, in my view, is in line with the policy to which I have referred; and it will fail, as socialistic and other unsound schemes have failed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (putting the question). The ayes have it, and the committee amendment, as amended, is agreed to.

The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is too late; is it not? The committee amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. KING. May I inquire what the committee amendment is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The amendment, as amended, has been agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was clamoring for recognition when the Chair stated the question which prevents the Senator from Utah from offering his amendment. I ask unanimous consent for reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I now move to strike out on line 14, page 17, the figures "$1,000,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$200,000,000", so that, if amended, it will read:

> The Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $200,000,000, which may be sold—

And so forth.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Should not the Senator's amendment be $21,000,000,000 in order to take care of all of the tenants, as indicated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]?

Mr. KING. If this bill is to be consistent and to care for all of the tenants in the United States it should authorize an expenditure of $21,000,000,000 instead of $1,000,000,000.

Mr. LONG. That is the principle.

Mr. KING. But in view of the fact that consistency and logic are not accepted as our guides, I will have to accept the charge of being inconsistent and illogical.

Calling attention to page 16—and I ask for information—the Corporation is to have a capital stock of $50,000,000. I do not know from the bill where the $50,000,000 is to come from. I had assumed that it was to be taken from the $4,800,000,000 relief appropriation. Yet it is not clear that that is the source from which this sum is to be supplied. I should like to ask the Senator if he will advise me whether the $50,000,000 is to be taken from the appropriation of $4,880,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. KING. It is certain that it is to come from that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; under the authority specifically granted by the Senate when the $4,000,000,000 bill was pending.

Mr. KING. Another question: The bill provides that the capital stock of the Corporation may be further increased. There is no limit, as I read the bill, as to the amount of capital stock which may be issued.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no authority for the payment of that capital stock. Of course, if bonds are sold and money is brought into the Corporation, it ought to have capital stock to correspond.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think that necessarily follows. This is the language:

> And the Board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to increase such capital stock from time to time in such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Corporation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator knows that there is no authority and no arrangement for the payment for any additional capital stock, therefore there is no way for paying for it except by the proceeds of the sale of bonds. There is no authority for the Treasury to pay it, and no direction for the Treasury to pay it, and therefore it could not do so.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator is correct, but I find here unlimited authority given to the board of directors, three men, to issue further capital stock. We do not know whether it will be $100,000,000 or a billion. I do not think the language of the bill restricts the stock issue to the one billion, nor is the authorization to increase the capital stock without limit dependent upon the sale of bonds.

In other words, as I read the bill, the capital stock may be a billion or two or more billion dollars; then bonds may be sold for a billion dollars, notwithstanding the authorization apparently is limited to $50,000,000, as found in line 16 on page 16.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that it is a most unusual proceeding to provide capital stock out of borrowings. If the capital stock comes from the sale of bonds, we immediately have our capital stock wiped out by a liability equal to the assets. As I read the bill, the capital stock is and must be provided by the President out of the emergency relief appropriation. I think there is no other interpretation possible.

Mr. KING. I hope the interpretation placed upon the bill by the Senator from Colorado is correct; but I am not sure that capital stock must be taken from the $4,880,000,000. Undoubtedly, there is authority given to the board of directors to issue capital stock without limit. It is not limited to one billion; it is not limited to the $300,000,000 which may be expended within 3 years. The board may issue a billion dollars of capital stock, and, as the Senator has stated, bonds will not be sold in order to obtain money for the capital stock. Capital stock is one thing, the bond issue is another; and the bill gives authority to issue capital stock in any sum which the desires of the board may dictate, and, in addition, to borrow a billion dollars.

Mr. President, it seems to me that to give authority to a board to issue bonds and to borrow money as they see fit, without limit, is unwise, unsound, and indefensible legislation.

It had been supposed that Congress controlled the purse strings of the country, but we are getting so now that the purse strings of the country are controlled entirely by executive departments, agencies, and bureaucratic organizations set up in the various Federal establishments.

The least that we can do is to limit the authority to issue bonds to $200,000,000. I ask for a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Logan	Reynolds
Austin	Davis	Lonergan	Robinson
Bachman	Dickinson	Long	Russell
Bailey	Donahey	McCarran	Schall
Bankhead	Fletcher	McGill	Schwellenbach
Barbour	Frazier	McKellar	Sheppard

Coolidge	La Follette	Radcliffe

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ADAMS (when Mr. WAGNER'S name was called). I wish to announce that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is necessarily absent, being detained on important committee work.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] and the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. They have a general pair.

I also announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], who are paired on this question. If the Senator from Vermont were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay", and if the Senator from Utah were present and at liberty to vote he would vote "yea."

I also announce that on this question the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. If present and at liberty to vote, the Senator from Delaware would vote "nay", and the Senator from New York would vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are necessarily detained from the Senate on important committee work.

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 32, as follows:

So the committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Farmers' Home Act."

SEC. 2. The powers conferred in this act shall be exercised with a view to checking the increase of tenancy in the United States, and dealing in an adequate way with the problem of farm tenancy in the United States, aiding in rural rehabilitation, and encouraging the ownership of farm homes.

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby created a Corporation to be known as the "Farmers' Home Corporation" (hereinafter referred to as the "Corporation"), which shall be an instrumentality of the United States.

(b) The management of the Corporation shall be vested in a board of directors (hereinafter referred to as the "board") of 5 members, consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration as members ex officio, and 3 members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not more than 2 of said 3 members shall be members of the same political party. Each of the three appointive members shall receive a salary at the rate fixed in the bylaws of the Corporation, but not in excess of $10,000 a year, and shall hold office for a term of 6 years, except that (1) any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term; and (2) the terms of office of the members first taking office after the date of enactment of this act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, one at the end of 2 years, one at the end of 4 years, and one at the end of 6 years, after the date of the enactment of this act. The President shall designate one of the appointive members as the chairman of the board. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration and any of the appointive members who hold another Government office shall receive no additional compensation for their services as members of the board. The members of the board who are first appointed shall be deemed to be the incorporators, and the incorporation shall be deemed to have been effected from the date of the first meeting of the board.

(c) The Corporation shall have capital stock in the amount of $50,000,000, and the board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to increase such capital stock from time to time in such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Corporation. Such original capital stock shall be subscribed for by the President on behalf of the United States, and payments for such subscriptions may be made from any sums appropriated by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935; and the President is further authorized to transfer to the Corporation, from the sums so allocated, such sums as he may from time to time deem desirable to carry out the purposes of this act. Payments for such stock and other sums to be so transferred shall be made to the Corporation by the Secretary of the Treasury at such time or times as the President may direct and the amount of all payments so received shall be available to the Corporation for administrative expenses under, and also to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Corporation shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury receipts for payments by him for or on account of such stock, and such receipts shall be evidence of the stock ownership of the United States.

(d) The Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $1,000,000,000, which may be sold by the Corporation to obtain funds for carrying out the purpose of this act. Such bonds shall be in such forms and denominations, shall mature within such periods from the date of their issue, shall bear such rates of interest, shall be subject to such terms and conditions, and shall be issued in such manner and sold at such prices, as may be prescribed by the Corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds, the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. In the event that the Corporation shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the holder the amount thereof, which is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and thereupon to the extent of the amount so paid the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any bonds of the Corporation issued under this subsection, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the Corporation's bonds hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the bonds of the Corporation acquired by him under this subsection. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the bonds of the Corporation shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. The bonds issued by the Corporation under this subsection shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes), now or hereafter imposed by the United States or any District, Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority. The Corporation, including its franchise, its capital, reserves, and surplus, its loans and income, and its personal property, shall likewise be exempt from such taxation. The Corporation shall have power, however, to make payments to States and governmental subdivisions thereof for the furnishing of such public services and facilities as are customarily provided for out of taxes and assessments, to the farms, farm homes, and farm communities established as provided for hereinafter. The Corporation shall have power to purchase in the open market at any time and at any price, not to exceed par, any of the bonds issued by it. Any such bonds so purchased may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be sold or resold at any time and at any price. The Corporation shall make appropriate provision for applying payments received by it to the retirement of the bonds issued under the provisions of this Act.

None of said bonds shall be issued within 1 year after the approval of this act. Within 3 years after the approval of this act not more than $300,000,000 of said bonds may be issued.

(e) The Corporation is authorized to appoint attorneys and shall, subject to the civil-service laws, employ such officers, examiners, and other experts and employees as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act and to fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. No such officer, employee, attorney, or agent shall be paid compensation at a rate in excess of the rate hereinabove provided in the case of directors of the Corporation, nor compensation in excess of that received by employees of the Government in like or similar services. Insofar as applicable, the benefits of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance
